On the other hand the plaintiff had valuators who considered that a similar building would cost from $30,000 to $33,000. None of them had ever been in the building, nor did they even live in Oshawa. But Judge Armour preferred the figures of the plaintiff's valuators and the company were consequently beaten.

The judge also held that the agreement was merely unliateral and that it was not binding on Mr. Demill for want of a consideration. He further stated that the company were pursuing a proper course in not paying Mr. Demill when they received notice of the Star Life mortgage. As to notice of the Star Life mortgage. As to the over-valuation, the court was of opinion that Mr. Demill did not make an intentional misrepresentation when he valued the building at $50,000. Millar & Sims, Solicitors for Economical Ins.
