Willard sighed relief as the crossroads signpost loomed through the fog. He was lost in a strange land, one made vapors. The earth was dank and slippery and dead leaves in the autumn woods on either side gave out a pungent, penetrating, almost overpowering smell. He had loved it as he set out that morning for a day-long tramp. If he had been weatherwise he would have stayed at the log tavern notwithstanding its rough fare and lack of comfort. The wind had blown in languid, sighing gasps with intervals of dead calm—dawn had been a red lower, dogs had barked acrid discontent, and all the sparse poultry of the tavern had been noisy and restless, as were the ragged vearling and restless, as were the ragged yearling nules on the common fronting the nouse, and the starveling calves armored n cocklepurs, bawling about a weedy

If they reject the just and durable peace which the Pope offers, the war will end by the bloodiest and most avenging of revolutions."

Take this prediction in connection with facts, as reported from day to troubling himself to think of his com-pass so long as he kept the wind in his ace. Then suddenly all things had blurred round about him—he had found with blank dismay that his compass was missing, fallen from his pocket doubtless as he stooped to look close at some sylvan mosaic of red and russet and gold-yellow, with a dash of velvet-green moss showing through. Color was his passion—it had brought him here to range the hill country in its autumn splendors. Viewing these colors he had sighed—with a despairing happiness. Art could not catch nor repeat them—they were so far beyond it. But for them he was storing up memories that might turn to gold later on. with blank dismay that his compass that might turn to gold later on.

"I will—God helping me," Willard interrupted fervently. He felt her temples as she laggard lightly gracient him, and slipped a tiny bare hand withn his free one. Clearly she mistook im for the laggard with whom she had offly at his groping touch, saying agerly: "If I had put on my habit, or own self tomorrow. You can call for the certificate any time after."

The-fog was lifting slightly, the rain slacking. Reluctantly Selim went around the house, down a ragged lawn, to a stretch of turnpike that showed like a tunnel in the gloom. Night had fallen—a few stars peered through. Also lights from a house of fair size a little way off the road. Without a word Willard made for it—as silently, as masterfully he lifted Ethel down, and started to knock, but the door flew open before them. Inside an anxious, white-haired woman cried to them: "Ethel! Dear, how did you get here? Thank God—in time."

Inside a man—tall, young, handsome—lay gasping his last, past speech but not past consciousness. Joy illumined his glazing eyes as they rested on Ethel. She sank, sobbing, at his bedside, kissed him once; then, with one glance at Willard, quietly fainted.

Explanation was easy. The dead man, John Tarbett, had been fatally hurt by a skidding car as he was going to keep his tryst. Hence his failure to meet Ethel. Chance or Providence sent John Willard instead of him. Willard showed his mettle finely—holding the sobbing gir tenderly but frmly, he explained to her the clouded situation, also what ease for her lay in making the futile ceremony effective. Unless she did, she must go back to the Turrentine house; if she did, he would promise her a brother's care and tendance. So they were married over again in the presence of the dead. Ethel mourned him truly, but youth means love. If her face is an index now, these three years past, she has been as happy a woman as though she had no history.

As there are but few farmers who have the time to take part in this kind of controversy, having been a farmer here in Middlesex County for some thirty years, and knowing there are many who think the farmer is getting more than his share these times, I will give you some figures to show what I was making at farming some eight years ago.
