THE INDISCREET PORTER.

They looked like a bridal couple as they boarded the Chicago train at Broad street station. There were half a score of friends on the platform who a score of friends on the platform who had come to say goodby. A few grains of rice dropped from the young man's hat brim as he entered the parlor car. He carefully escorted his fair partner to a seat. All the other passengers smiled indulgently and looked interested. Then the young man extended his to a seat. All the other passengers smiled indulgently and looked interested. Then the young man extended his hand to the young woman and said in a very loud voice, and with the most commonplace formality: "Well, Miss Blank, the train is about to pull out. I wish you a very pleasant journey." And doffing his soft hat he hurriedly left the car. The passengers looked disappointed; the young woman looked nervous. By and by she called the porter and whispered to him. The porter and whispered to him. The porter and whispered to him. The amount and said in a voice that was audible to every one in the car: "Ye're all right, ma'am. He's in de smoking compartment." Every body smiled and the bride smiled prettily.
