GLADSTONE STILL WRITES. Gladstone has contributed to the last number of the North American Review discussed until Mr. Chamberlain menioned it in a very unfortunate speech. It is astonishing that a man who has at tained to the age of seventy-eight years should be able, amidst unceasing demands upon his time, and with a strain upon his mind beneath which many younger statesmen would have sunk, to contribute to the literature of the day those rowerful articles which so often issue from his pen. Pushing along amidst many and oppressing difficulties a great national cause, and with the eyes of the civilized world watching his every action, he yet finds time to turn into classic English the thoughts of the Grecian Homer, to carry on a controversy upon scientific subjects with Huxley the uncrowned king of science, and to contribute brilliant and enduring articles to the literature of the day. What an example for the rising generation to follow, and what a pattern for those who would enter the political and the committee and other leading politicians. The president stated his intention, after the new ministry was formed, to at once close the present seasion of parliament until after the coming senatorial elections.

Several were severly injured.
