

SORROW.
Upon my life she laid her touch divine,
And merry speech and careless laughter died;
She fixed her melancholy eyes on mine,
And would not be denied.
I saw the West-wind loose his cloudlets white,
In such a careering through the April sky;
I could not stave, though joy was at its height,
For she stood silent by.
I watched the lovely evening fade away,
A mist was lightly drawn across the stars,
She broke my quiet dream, I heard her say,
"Behold your prison bars."
"Earth's gladness shall not satisfy your soul,"
This beauty of the world in which you live;
The crowning grace that sanctifies the whole,
That falcons can give."
I heard, and shrank away from her afraid,
But still she held me, and would still abide
Youth's bounding pulses slackened and obeyed.
With slowly ebbing tide,
"Look out beyond the evening sky," she said,
"Beyond the changing splendours of the day,
Accept the pain, the weariness, the dread—
Accept, and bid me stay!"
I turned and clasped her close, with sudden strength,
And slowly, sweetly, I became aware
Within my arms God's angel stood at length,
White-robed, and calm and fair.
And now I look beyond the evening star,
Beyond the changing splendours of the day,
Knowing the pain He sends more precious far,
More beautiful than they.

CHAPTER XVII.
GEORGE FALLS IN LOVE, AND UNEXPECTEDLY ENCOUNTERS FRIENDS.

In his walk thither his mind was naturally filled with the new acquaintances he had made, the information he had gained—which to him was of such strong and tender interest—and the warm sympathy and friendship of which he had so unexpectedly found himself the object. The heart of the youth glowed with a new joy and beat with a new strength as he traversed the fields and crossed the park in the still night, under the soft rays of the moon. His personal isolation had been broken by his meeting with Matthew and Allie. He was no longer alone there—unknown and unknown. He had found those who had known him in childhood—who knew all the circumstances of his adoption—whose warm, honest bosoms could best responsive to his own; and this invested Ardgoon with quite a new aspect. To the joy produced by his growing love for Lillias was now added the happiness flowing from social intercourse with others who had an affection for and an interest in him.

Under the influence of these strengthening and elating feelings, he pursued his way, cheered also by the peaceful beauty of the surrounding scene. Though the evening was frosty, it was calm, and the hoar frost glittered like glass on the grass, which crisped under his buoyant tread. How silent and motionless were the trees, as they stood dark and bare in the park, and cast in finest tracery the shadow of their branches on the ground. Nothing stirred or moved within his sight, except when occasionally a hare started from the side of a fence and trotted across the moonlit space to some new shelter. George was not more than half-way across the park, and was moving forward within the shadow of a row of beeches, when at some distance away he saw the figure of a woman come into the moonlight and pass across a glade towards a rustic arbour which stood in front of a clump of trees.

She was not more than half a minute in sight, but short as the time was, it enabled him to recognise in the figure the person of Lillias, and also to observe that she wore a distracted air, and seemed to be in a state of terrible grief and distress. Overcome by astonishment, George stood still, gazing in the direction she had gone. Why was she there alone at that hour, and what could be the cause of her evident suffering?

The heart of love is quick to feel alarm and as soon as the youth's first feeling of astonishment had subsided, he bounded from under the trees and made for the spot where he had seen Lillias disappear. A very few minutes sufficed for him to reach the place, but as he neared the clump of trees he divined that she must have entered the arbour, and hesitated a moment as to breaking in upon her seclusion.

He stood still and listened, and as he did so he heard sobs proceeding from the arbour. He could not hesitate any longer. Lillias was in the midst of some strange, keen grief, and he must be by her side either to alleviate or share it.

He went forward cautiously, and moved in silence round the clump of trees till a view of the front of the arbour was obtained. The moon shone full into it, and he saw Lillias seated on the bench, with her head and arms laid upon the rustic table, and her beautiful frame shaking violently under the vehemence of her sobbing.

With a low cry he rushed forward, and was at the entrance of the arbour ere she had time to look up. But startled by his coming she rose to her feet in wildest terror, and was about to utter a shriek, when she recognised him.
