London, Saturday, September 10.

The Week of the War.

There is an absence of detailed in formation since the battle of Liao Yang but Kuropatk'n reports that his army has reached Mukden safely without the loss of a gun. Whether he intends to push northward is not disclosed, but the decision may rest with the Japanese, who are at his heels and said to be threatening his flanks. They car render his position untenable if they see a strategic advantage in keeping up the pursuit. The morale of the Russian army must be terribly shaken by continual failure to withstand the Japanese and by headlong and exhaust.

The Czar has ordered the immediate mobilization of three new army corps. while twenty quick-firing batteries have been hurriedly entrained for the east. A Russian army corps for Manchurian service comprises 41,000 men, with 124 guns, 3,717 carriages and 17,000 horses. An English expert estimates that to transport this force and equipment to the front requires 216 trains, or the whole of the possible railway traffic, for thirty-seven days. But part of the possible traffic must be employed in forwarding supplies and munitions, and delays and breakdowns must be reckoned with. To transport two corps of $2,000 men would require not weeks, but months, if generall accepted estimates are correct. Large reserves may be already gathered at Harbin, but they are evidenly for from sufficient. As Russia is restricted to a single line of railway, over which men and supplies must be transported 5,000 miles. there can be no such thing as "rushing" heavy reinforcements to the front.

Authentic and graphic descriptions of the battle of Liao Yang have been received and show it to have been one of the most awful in history. The Oku, sustained the greatest slaughter. Oku is said to have underestimated the twenty-four hours he hurled his infantry against the Russian entrenchments, "which resembled a miniature Mount Pelee in eruption." The Japanese were each time mowed down by an avalanche of lead. One battalion managed to reach the first Russian trench and there next morning the Japanese and Russians were found lying intermingled "in one red burial blent." The assault failed; but Kuropatkin pressed on his other flank by Kuróki, withdrew from the position during the night. This fearful attack occurred on August 31, but the struggle was not over. The Russians still clung tenaciously to Liao Yang and on Sept. 3 Oku ordered a general assault, which proved a repetition of ghastly carnage Failing in this resorted to his guns. and the artillery fire that followed is described by the Times' correspondent as the severest the word has ever seen. Although his assault had already cost him 20,000 lives Oku determined upon a final desperate effort. His last reserves were pushed to the fighting line and this time he succeeded. Only troops absolutely oblivious to death and inspired by fanatical courage would have been equal to the ordeal. Port Arthur, with all its outworks lost, still flings defiance at the Japanese. The hardest part of the attack is to come-the subjugation of the Russian artillery in the main line of works, followed by the assault. The Japanese are singularly reticent as to their operations around the fortress, and the only news is brought out by refugees. There is the testimony of two reliable English war correspondents, at present in Tokio, that Japan has plenty of strength in reserve. Mr. George Lynch of the London Chronicle, says:

"The Japanese are not going to be overpowered by numbers. Arrangements have now been completed with that characteristic attention to detai which distinguishes everything they do to put a million men if necessary in the field by next June in the event of the war continuing until that date. Discussing this subject the other day with a man whose opinion should carry weight, he contended that even as regards men with no previous military training, which is ot the case with the landwehr, that fair infantry soldiers can be manu factured out of the average Japanese after six months' training. quite agree with him in this. They would put more work into that six months than Russians would put into two years. They would not have to be driven to drill, but every man would be keen to learn the utmos he possibly could in the time. That soldier-spirit which I have insisted on and pointed out at the outbreak of the war will count for a geat deal, and to anyone here the devoted patriotism of the people is a thing that is borne in on the mind of the observer as a feeling of absorbing, vivifying intensity unequaled in country, in any age. Like a column service is interesting and instructive. It is acknowledged the better. Congregational Church tomorrow. service is interesting and instructive. They roll up from every walk in life. The farm laborer, bent with conthe jinriksha coolie, as fit as nature ever allowed a man to be; the pot ter, the cook, the photographer-they all come up in turn, the majority soft from the sedentary life into which the Japanese so easily falls. But cated evil when it is balanced against this is noting. It is an easily eradithat commanding asset that is paramount in very Japanese, that asset which is responsible for the history of the last six months. There is ingrained in the heart of every Japanese, be he prince or pauper, a patriotic desire for discipline, which has made the nation the military power that it is. This is the secret. Where we in the west find ourselves obliged to devote most of the soldier's time with the colors to the labor of instilling discipline into his nature, the Japanese linstructors have only to train their men to apply their natural desire for discipline to the best teaching in the requirements of modern warfare. It is this same quality which has made our Indian army so good, only the native of India has not the qualifying temper of a national patriotism, which is the main religion in Japan."

The Fair.

The fair grounds are in a bustle of preparation for the opening of the gates to the public on Monday.
