AN INSOLVENT ACT.

The chairman opened the discussion, and said he himself considered that an insolvent act was an absolute necessity. an insolvent act was an absolute necessity. This necessity was hardly felt now, as business was prosperous, but it would be perceived when dult times came again.

Mr. McMaster said he thought that in the face of the large majority by which the old act was abolished, it would be a waste of time to endeavour to get such an act passed. The only thing he could suggest was that an act should be passed, not under the name of an insolvent act, providing for a delivery of the insolvent's effects into the hands of creditors and an equitable distribution thereof. and an equitable distribution Mr. G. B. Smith doubted whether par-liament would pass an act giving relief to the creditors without any corresponding relief to debtors. He thought the effect of not having an insolvent act was to make merchants more careful in giving credit. (Hear, hear.)
