Why Rain Follows Lightning

Why does a heavy downpour of rain often follow a clap of thunder? Not, as is popularly believed, because the thunder jostles the clouds particles together in raindrops. In the violent turmoil between the positive and negative electricity in a thundercloud there will be places where the production of drops, by condensation, and there subsequent breaking up proceeds more rapidly than elsewhere. Hence in these places there will be more drops to fall as rain, and also more electrification, the rainfall occurring about the same time as the flash.

We have then, starting towards the earth at the same time, light, sound and raindrops. The light, traveling at a speed of about 186,000 miles a second, reaching us almost instantly. The sound travels far more slowly—about 1,090 feet a second—but the rain falls much slower still. Thus we observe, first the lightning, then the thunder and then rain.—Popular Science Monthly.
