CARDINAL GIBBONS.

The foremost figure in the Roman Catholic church in the United States was Cardinal Gibbons. His views on all questions were heard with respect by the people, as those of a man of wide learning, clear brain and lofty purpose. He was never a promoter of religious of the seriment years ago the people who were not of own religious faith. In any great crisis his counsel was eminently sane, and marked by a broad spirit of good-will. He possessed the qualities of a statesman and a peace-traker as well as those of a great churchman. At Rome his views were sought as those of a man qualified to speak with authority on all matters relating to the church in America. Many years ago the publication of his book, The Faith of Our Pathers, did much to disarm prejudice, for it was not so much controversial as explanatory, presenting without rancor the case for the Roman Catholic church. He was in the true sense a man of peace, and opposed to social and religious strife as well as war; and yet when the United States entered the receat great war he appealed for universal support of the government and denounced the war war he strongly urged the entry of the War he strongl ge bonis by Increasing the Bitters, which has been some of the people's would mean in terress in the sales of consequent that have been some of the people's would mean in terress in the sales of the people's would mean in terress in the sales of the people's would mean in terress in the sales of bottom boars the bushoos of the country, which has the been sales of the country, which has the been sales of the country would be save the save the sales of the country would be save the s
