Rose of Old Harpeth (Continued from page 18.)

And it was here that Everett found few minutes later as he walk ed rapidly up the milk-house path and stood in the barn door in evident hurried search for somebody or some thing.

"Hello, General," he said with a smile at the barrel full of sleepers at Stonie's side, "do you know where Rose Mary is?"

"Yes," answered the General, "she are in her room putting buttermilk on the five freekles that comed on her nose when she heed out in the garden without no subonnet. I found 'em all for her this morning, and she don't like 'em. You can go on in and see if they are any better for her, I ain't got the time to fool with 'em now."

"Not for worlds!" exclaimed Everet as he wordas: exclaimed Ever-et as he sat down on an upturned peck measure in close proximity to the barrel. "Hare you decided to have Mrs. Poteet and Mrs. Sniffer swap-er-er puppies, Stonie?" he further remarked.

"No, I didn't," answered Stonie with one of his rare smiles which made him so like Rose Mary that Everet's heart glowed within him. Stonie was, as a general thing, as grave as a judge, with something hauntingly, almost tratgically serious in his austere young face, but his pmiles when they cane were flashes of the very divinity of youth and were a strange incernation of the essence of Rose Mary's cousing lovelines. "He was erying because he was by hisself and 1 bringed him along to wait till his mother came home. He beiougs some to us, 'cause he's named for Uncle Tuck, and I oughter pester with him same as Tobe have to. It's fair to do my part." "No, I didn't," answered Stonie fair to do my part."

"Yes, General, you always do your "Yes, General, you always do your part-and always will, I think," said Everett. as he looked down at the sturdy litche chap so busy with his long strings, weaving them over and over alowly but carcitult. "A man's part," he added as two serious eyes were raised to his.

"In just a little while I'll be a man and have Uncle Tucker and Aunt Viney and Aunt Amanda to be mine viney and Aunt Amanda to be mine to keep care of always, Rose Mamie says," answered Stonie in his most practical tone of voice as he began to see the end of the long strings draw into his waving of the cracker. What about Rose Mamie herself" aded Everett softly, his voice thrillwith reverent tendernes. "When I get big enough to keep care of everything here I'm going to let Rose Manie gat a husband and a hesp of children, like Mis' Poteot---but I'm acjoing to make o'm behave theyselves better'n Tobe and Pergris and the rest of 'em do. Aunt Yiney says Mis' Potest spares the rod too much, but I'fl fix Rose Manie's chil-dren if they don't mind her and me." (Continued near useh)
