The town hall was crowded to the doors tonight when the inquest on the death of Magee was opened. The affair has created intense interest in the town, and until nearly midnight the large gathering sweltered in the building listening to the evidence and awaiting the verdict of the coroner's jury Magee was known either personally or by reputation to nearly everyone in Ingersoll. This is the home of his younger days, and by those who knew him at that time he was regarded as a desperate character. In days past he knew Robert Kyle, the husband of the woman who did the shooting, intimately, and it was on invitation from him that Magee first went to the Kyle home. He was a welcome guest at first, but in a very short time he began to appear there regularly at meal and at other times in an intoxicated condition.

Mrs. Kyle testified that he had abusmade improper proposals to her, and made threats that he would burn the house and place Paris green but he persisted in visiting the house cripple. during the absence of Mr. Kyle. He had so terrorized Mrs. Kyle and a young lady, Miss Whitman, who met Magee some months ago in Berlin, and who chanced to meet him here, and whom he introduced over a week ago to Mrs. Kyle, that they at times had to lock themselves in the house Finally Mr. Kyle complained to the police of Magee's conduct.
