It was a perfect exposition of lack of timely enough hitting in the face of good pitching, with exceptions, of course, as there are always to baseball and to all rules.

In the first game. Flint with lucky but yet official hits, was able to get a three-run lead, and just as London showed signs of getting to Rusty Lecronier in the third frame, Dan O'Leary removed him, and against Feigert the Londoners merely did a lot of ineffective club swinging which netted them two lone hits and no runs at all, at all.

In the initial frame London scored twice. Not until the sixth was any more registering recorded when the visitors again tallied one. They repeated in the next time up and just for ygood measure tore off a couple of extra runs in their half of the eighth, thereby putting the contest on ice. The locals' lone tally came on a scratch single in the ninth by Hill when nobody was out. The next two players sacrificed him across the plate.
