REUBEN.

BY DERMAN THOMPSON. It was a legacy from the father who had died before Reuben was 10 years old, and left him to the care of U cle J sah, the brother of R-upen's long dead mother. The strongest memory R uben retained of his father was a mind-picture of a white haired man sitting up in bed, with the beloved violin in his hands, fi ling the poor attic room with sweet wounds H was partially paralyzed even ther, and later, when his firgers became helpless, from scraping a catgut, and more than once is ant destruction was threatened to R upon's one pleasure. H, grew of aid to raise the sweet sounds he loved in ide the farm house, and would steal away to practile the lessons his father had taught him by the brook side, in the whispering woods

Break his votion! Destroy his deares friend, his sole comfort! But for Datsy?

What would be not do for Daisy.

Perhaps Uncle Josiah was right! Per haps if he had no cutlet for the dream-treat field his soil, they would cease to haunt him, and he would co quer the maz-rousne of form drudgery that was such a heart breaking problem to him. Perhap-wried all the phantoms that broke into restry upon his violin were driven away.

h. w. uld be the practical farmer to whom Under Josish would give Daisy. Musing thus very sorrowfully, Rauben took the violin from its case and went to the woods, to an opening the country folks called the fairy ring. Here he sat upon a high stone and played his farewell, a dirge of hope. Great tears fell over his pale checks, as the weird, melarcholy strain coroid through the space around him Then he wrapped the violin once, twice in his arms, kissed it tenderly and lifed it his arms, kissed it tenderly and in outhingh in the air to much is on the rock.

But his heart failed him! His arm dropped

"You had better sell it, or, better still, play on it. Was it you I heard play ing, as I came through the wood?

"H'm! Play again for m ." G arry R uben lifted his violin and drew "I will pay you the 'Carnival of the B rds," he said, and there arose upon the air a twitte ing chorus, here a sancy trill, there a hu y chirp, then a roula e, till the very air seemed alive with se while under all a sweet melody throbbed and melted into sof est strains.

"This is the Brook's Hymn," Reuben said, and the rippling stream was mocked and echoed in quaint fantastic music "Who wrote these? the stranger asked

"They were never written. They came from my heart," was the quiet repy. "1 win play you some written music."

And ag in the violin obeyed the how as the works R upen had studied from his father's music rose upon the summer air. And you were shout to break your vio lie?" the stranger said.
