

our civilization. Is it not, then, eminently sensible that we should use all of the very considerable scientific resources we possess to determine quickly and effectively the nature and degree of the risks involved in artificial contamination of the atmosphere? We cannot do less if we are to accept our responsibility to future generations. We might well do more. It is with these considerations in mind, Sir, that my Delegation is presenting this Resolution which has been so widely co-sponsored. I hope that it can be unanimously endorsed.
