Up to the attempt of Norcross to kill him, altho 75 years old, Mr. Sage was truthfully classed among the youngest men of New York. With scarcely a wrinkle in his face, with a step as brisk as a youth's, he had almost as blithsome a personality as much younger men. His hair of irongray was as thick and profuse as when a schoolboy in the Mohawk Valley. His eyebrows were heavy and almost shaggy, and at that time there was just the faintest sympleton of dye in the whistens of his suspicion of dye in the whiskers of his One of his most marked peculiarities was One of his most marked peculiarities was that in conversation a merry twinkle in his blue eyes lighted up his face. When he talked on serious subjects, the lid of Mr. Sage's right eye winked like that of the heavy villain in a comedy.

Mr. Sage was usually attired in what are ludicrously known in Wall-street as slop-shop clothes. They were ill-fitting, and if diversity of raiment is an evidence of Al.glo-mania. Mr. Sage was an inexcusable example. His coat, waistcoat and trousers were frequently of three different patterns. His shoes were thick and enduring, and his scarfs were homely. But at all times his linen was of immaculate whiteness. The jewelry he wore consisted of a gold
