HONEY NEEDED TO

Last Year's Crop Sold Quick-

The appeal for greater production is especially to those who are neglecting their bees or are not managing them in the best manner. There are many apiaries in good locations for profitable honey production more/particularly in eastern Canada, where colonies in box hives or in seldom-opened frame hives, now producing from 20 to 40 pounds of honey each, could be made to produce 80 to 100 pounds or more in an average season. If time cannot be spared to give the bees the attention they need, they might be handed to a member of the family who would take an interest in Sugar is an important war food, its price is high and there will probably be a shortage in the near future. Honey, the unequalled natural sweet that sugar cannot wholly replace, is being affected in sympathy. The unusually large crop of honey produced in Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba in 1916 was sold quickly at prices slightly above those of the previous season and present indications point to a still greater demand and higher prices for the new crop. Thus, by producing as much honey as possible become acquainted with the better methods of bee-keeping is to arrange to attend one of the apiary demonstrations that will be held early in the summer, under the auspices of several of the provincial bee-keepers' associations. A list of the bee-keepers' associations with the addresses of the secretaries is given in the above-mentioned bulletin.

Another class of bee-keeper that may Another class of bee-keeper that may profit greatly at this time is the expert apiarist located in a good honey producing region, whose time is not fully oc-cupied with the bees. His principal problem will be how to increase the num-ber of bees to the fullest extent in time per of bees to the fullest extent in time for the honey flow, so as to make the most of his valuable knowledge of bee management. The early replacing of un-satisfactory queens is important. Judi-cious feeding during the dearth that in many places immediately precedes the honey flow will help under some condi-tions. By dividing strong colonies not tions. By dividing strong colonies not less than six weeks before the middle of the main honey flow an increased crop-of honey will be obtained, provided fer-tile queens are on hand to be given to the queenless part. These queens may be procured from breeders in the south-ern states at from 80 cents to $1 each. This procedure is chiefly applicable to the fireweed and golden-rod districts; as a rule the clover honey flow comes too early for it. Two-pound packages of bees with untested fertile queens obtained from the south by express in May or early June costing about $4 each, in-cluding transportation charges, will be found a paying investment, if they ar-

There should be a sufficient supply of supers for extracted honey, with trames and foundation, or combs, on hand to take a maximum crop, and this year it is more than ever necessary to order supplies and honey containers early. Two-comb supers may be fastened together to make one deep super for extracted honey production. Particulars of an attractive container for honey that has been designed to meet a possible difficulty in obtaining sufficient tin palls or glass jars will be supplied on application to the apiarist. It will be wise to retain some combs of clover honey in case they are needed for winter stores, because sugar may be very dear in the autumn.
