Nevertheless, the distinctness of the uthor's conception of each character, and author's conception of each character, and of its separate traits, is one of his striking merits. Mr. Cardwell is the Respectable Politician, and the idea of respectability thus incarnated is evolved elaborately and with endless variety of illustration. There are plenty of other respectable men, but Mr. Cardwell is the type. Respectability itself, we are told, "does not express a distinct quality in a character so much as the impression made by a character or a group of qualities in the mind of an observer; and this impression, distinct but indefinable, Mr. Cardwell makes in a more perfect manner than In store and for sale low for cash to close the W. He reminds us that Nicias was "one of the earliest types of the safe was "one of the earliest types of the safe man; and he is responsible for the greatest disaster of Greek history." So a "safe" General would represent a doubtful title to confidence, and "the late Sir Charles Napier was thought to have made but a lame boast when he vaunted his prowess during the Russian war in bringing his ships home from the Baltic uninjured. The ambition simply to keep a whole skin has never been productive of great things." Nor are those who appland Lord Derby's safeness spared. 'The beneficiaries of abuses and vested wrongs, by a well known figure of speech, call Lord Derby 'safe' because they think they would be safe under him." And once more changing the figure, he adds: "The term is applied to him as if he were a sort of harbor refuge from Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Disraeli. A harbor of refuge is a very useful and necessary thing; but a vessel which is always there will not give a good account of its cargo. In sluggish and timid moments England may be disposed to put into that port for rest and repairs; but she will not remain there long, unless, like some of her unused ships, she is to rot and fall to pieces." The ridicule is capped by the remark that no one thinks of calling Cromwell or Chatham "safe" statesmen, and that a "safe" statesman is merely safe when no danger threatened.

TRIBUNE OFFICE. of Cicero, when he saw his diminutive son-in-law girt with gigantic weapon, "Who has tied Dolabella to that sword?" ap 22 tf of Cleero, when he saw his diminutive son-in-law girt with gigantic weapon. "Who has tied Dolabella to that sword?" The name is more than the man—nay, "the shadow of a great name is more potent than the substance of a meager politician." It is almost a pitry." It is suggested, "that families are not allowed to register titles, as the proprietors of magazines and newspapers are in the habit of doing, not so much for their own use as for the purpose of preventing their employment by unauthorized and unconnected persons." Sir Charles Wood's varied experience in the great number of places he has held, beginning with that of "whip" under Earl Grey, has fitted him, "in the temporary absence of the head of a Department, to take his place and to throw everything into confusion at a moment's notice." He cannot speak; he proved a failure as Finance Minister; he is not a wit, nor a scholar, and his steady progress in office is difficult to understand, though "a partial explanation may be found in the fact that he was the son-in-law of Earl Grey, whose family affections are as well known as his patriotism, with which they are gracefully blended in the public service, and especially in the distribution of patronage." Yet some sources there must be for his reputation, and the search for them results in the discovery that "Lord Hallfax is a man of great quickness of superficial apprehension and acquisition;" and on the testimony of some of those who have been associated with him administration it is observed that "he sees with marvelous rapidity all that the does see of any question which is submitted to him, which is the minimum visitive in a diministrative capacity: "* "This promptitude of wrong action upon imperfect conceptions has given Lord Hallfax ac certain reputation is a man of administrative capacity: while the readiness with which he will give a Lad opinion, while men of sounder and larger intelligence are slowly feeling their way to a good one, makes him an adviser full of sagacity and resource.
