ARTHUR HENDERSON, M.P. Representative of British Labor in All That is Best.

That Mr. Arthur Henderson, M. P., chairman of the British Labor Party, whose name was included in the New Year's honors list as a Privy Councillor, was a born leader of men is evident from the fact that before he had reached his twenties he was a speaker and organizer not a little of his success to the fact that he does not belong to the aggressive type of labor man. He is the representative of labor in all that is best, in the right and responsible sense of the term, said an important London Tory journal about him not long ago—high praise indeed for a man who began to earn his own living before he was twelve years of age.

His Favorite Motto. Solid and quiet, is the description which has been applied to Mr. Henderson on more than one occasion, and it is a fact that his motto, from the day when he began to think for himself, has been, "More work and less talk." To quote the words of a north countryman overheard on one occasion by the writer, "Art's a deep 'un. He don't say much, but, by gum, he can think."

One of the first men to recognize the abilities of Mr. Henderson was Lord Morley, whose eulogy of a clever speech which the labor leader made in 1895 placed him in the direct running for the Liberal candidate of Newcastle-on-Tyne. Indeed, his name was actually submitted by the local executive, but at the last moment Mr. James Craig, a former colleague of Viscount Morley in the representation of the city, was persuaded to stand again; and thus it was that Mr. Henderson came within a hair's-breadth of becoming Liberal candidate for Newcastle. Ultimately he entered Parliament as Labor member for the Barnard Castle Division of Durham in 1903, which constituency he has since represented.

Religion and Politics. The amount of work which Mr. Henderson has accomplished and his many activities have often amazed his colleagues. He is chairman of a dozen and one labor committees, has sat on several Royal Commissions, is secretary of the labor party outside Parliament, has worked indefatigably on the local councils of Durham and Darlington, of which latter place he was mayor in 1903, and as a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church he has for many years been an active lay preacher and a representative at the annual conference.

The work of the National Brotherhood and the P.S.A. movement of which he is president for 1914-15, also claims his attention. This reference to Mr. Henderson's religious work recalls the rather curious fact that at one time he was known by two names. When he first appeared in politics there were some of his old friends who did not recognize him by the name of Arthur Henderson. They had known him as Arthur Heath, and remembered him as the leader of a little band, who conducted a Wesleyan mission at Arthur's Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Meeting him in Manchester not long ago, one of them made some reference to this. "Oh, there is no mystery about it," he replied. "My mother remarried while I was still young, and the neighbors, not unnaturally, got into the way of calling me by my stepfather's name. I accepted it tacitly for a while, but on joining a trade society I was obliged to give my proper name, and I became Henderson again."

THE KAISER'S TRAIN.

Composed of Six Heavy Coaches—A Veritable Palace.

Whenever possible the Kaiser when travelling between Berlin and the fighting line, uses his luxurious State train, which is a veritable palace on wheels. Six coaches, each weighing over sixty tons, compose the special train, and of these four are reserved for the Emperor and his suite, and the other two are used for kitchens. The second coach in the train is the one reserved for the Kaiser for his personal quarters, and it contains a salon, bedroom, dressing room, bathroom, and sleeping apartments for his bodyguard. The salon is paneled in the wood of an ancient cedar tree taken from Mount Lebanon, the gift of the ex-Sultan Abdul Hamid of Turkey. The floor is of black wood taken from the piles of a wooden bridge built across the Rhine by Julius Caesar in the year 55 B.C., while the ceiling is decorated with a design representing the six great rivers of Germany.

The windows of the salon are protected by thick steel bars, and armed sentries stand at the doors of the apartment night and day. The last coach in the train is used by an engineer, who has charge of the machinery which operates a complicated system of emergency brakes. The Kaiser's two daschunds, Wardi and Hexl, have their kennels on the train, and they generally accompany their master on his travels.

His Honor Lost.

"She ought to drop dead for the awful lies she's telling," said the plaintiff, excitedly, listening to the witness for the defence.

"Don't say that," admonished the judge.

"She ought," repeated the plaintiff.

"Don't say that again!" warned the judge.

"Well, I won't but she ought."

Well, Does Anybody Say "Po-tah-toes"?

"The causes of war are sometimes strangely trivial," remarked the student of history.

"Yes," replied Miss Cayenne, "I know a once peaceful family that has lined up in factions over the question of whether it is proper to say 'ta-mah-tos' or 'to-may-toes' or write."

Making Restitution; Or, The Bridal Dress.

"Will you oblige me with the number of Mrs. Ferrier's room?" she said, in a low voice.

The clerk glanced at his book ere he answered, and Leslie hurried on, eager to escape from the critical and curious gaze which surrounded her on every side. "What change," yesterday the belle and favorite of the place, every one aspiring for her smiles or no-ties, her very name and gestures ceased and modeled from her coming acknowledged with obsequious adulation, to-day shrunk from and avoided her as a forger's deserted wife—a woman whose presence was all an ignominious blot on the faces of the other guests. Leslie felt it most keenly; but what was there left to her but to endure?

She tapped softly at her cousin Fenella's door. The maid admitted her. Yes, Mrs. Ferrier was at home, and Leslie was ushered into the parlor, where Fenella was superintending the fitting of a white organdie dress, with clusters of silver-green oak leaves and acorns, out of an imported French box. She dropped a spray on the floor as she recognized the new-comer.

"Leslie Ford," she said, "I am glad to see you. Yes, it is I, Fenella," said Leslie, unable to refrain from smiling. "I shall be glad to think that we should meet again thus."

"Mrs. Ferrier was taken by surprise at first, but she soon recovered herself again. And what may I ask," said she, "procures me the honor of this visit?"

"I have come to make what restitution I can," said Leslie, with a quivering lip. "I have sold my wardrobe and jewels. I have taken what money my husband has, and it amounts nearly to three thousand dollars. It is not mine, Fenella, it is your father's money."

"Oh, Fenella," said Leslie, "I don't tell him that I, at least, know nothing of all this until last night. And I don't know how much of the twenty-two thousand dollars," insolently demanded Fenella shrunk back.

"Oh, Fenella," said Leslie, "I don't tell him that I, at least, know nothing of all this until last night. And I don't know how much of the twenty-two thousand dollars," insolently demanded Fenella shrunk back.

"There," said Mrs. Barnaby, briskly, "I will call it a settled arrangement. When can you come to my duties here, without an English governess, and—"

"I can remain to-night," said Leslie, "but I must go to my room to-night. I am better, so far as I am concerned."

"I will conduct you to your room at once—a large and airy apartment, which I trust you will not object to sharing with two of my young ladies, Gordon and Miss Maydew, charming young creatures, I assure you, but needing special surveillance."

TO HIS MOTHER.

A Pathetic Incident of the War in Europe.

In France the relation between a son and his mother is very sweet and tender. Even the boys of the least cultivated class show an almost invariable courtesy and unselfishness to their mothers.

I was in Paris during the first two months of the war, and I met Mrs. Lillian Hayden Hieson to the Youth's Companion, and a woman who worked for me spoke often of her only child, a boy, who was in one of the first regiments ordered to the front. He never knew anything of his mother as the letters he wrote; I borrowed it of her that I might copy it. In translating it literally I have kept much of the charm of the original.

"Little Mother, Oh Dearest, I love you. The boy is gay and joyous as the birds that sing. Dust thou hear that, little one! Thou must not worry, not in the very least, my mother. Indeed thou must not imagine how happy we have been nor what delicious things we have to eat. We caught a rabbit to put in our stew and we found potatoes in a field. Thy boy grows fat, my mother! Why shouldst thou worry? Thou must not mourn when we are laughing. Give us all the friends my loving greeting, and then, dear heart, look not for letters. It is so seldom that we can write. Remember that I am safe and that I love thee."

"I send thee a thousand kisses and I am thy son."

This letter sent to the mother by a comrade of her son, had been written on a scrap of paper with a pencil while he was in the trenches, before the engagement in which he lost his life. He said nothing of the horror and the bloodshed, nothing of his own weariness and dread, nothing of the agony and cruelty and death that he had seen. He wrote only what he knew would reassure and comfort her.

The letter did strangely comfort the lonely, sorrowful mother. "I made her forget the war and think of her boy as a gay and laughing child again. There had been no funeral. She had not seen him dead. His joyous written words were far more real to her than what she knew of his death. His loving thought had lifted her into that realm of the spirit in which there is no death."
