"Victor! I did not know you were here."

"Forgive me for startling you so. I waked over to the cottage, promising myself the pleasure of returning with you, but Edith told me you had gone, and I knew since I had not met you I should find you here. I have been standing here at least ten minutes, trying to read the meaning of an expression more mystical than I have ever seen hefore on the face of my little sister."

"It was very ungenerous of you," she said, trying to smile as she met his searching glance.

"Was it!"- It is more ungenerous of you to mope about with some secret trouble which you will not confide to those who love you."

It was on her lips to say that the words applied in some mea-u-himself, but she checked the impulse, and instead answered, lightly:

"Who says I have any trouble?"

"I," he answered, throwing hefet. "I have not studied your expressive face for nothing all these years. Proud and reserved as you are, I can read something in that face which was not there a month ago."

"Indeed?" half-laughing; " and suppose I should say the same thing of yourself?"

"I should believe you," he answer.

"I should believe you," he answer

suppose I should say the same thing of yourself?"

"I should believe you," he answered, simply.

A faint shadow of surprise fitted across her face as she looked down at the clear cut-handsome features upraised to hers.

There was a cloud on the noble brow, a shadow of preplexity or grief in the dark eyes. What was it? she wondered, with a sudden rebellion against her unkind thoughts, and a longing to see him rise, like a brave young hero, and emerge from the cloud of suspicion that seemed to envelop him.

He studied the grave, troubled young face with thoughtful steady eves.

"Rose, you are in trouble. You may decive others with those forced, in different smiles, but you cannot decive me. The eyes of love are not so blind. Tell me what it is that annoys you; perhaps I can help you."

She shook her head, smiling still, and restlessly breaking off clusters of the wild flowers in reach of her hand and tossing them into the brook.

"It is nothing, I tell you, Victor. The change is in yourself, not me."

He sighed, involuntarily.

"I will be franker than you, and acknowledge that I am annoyed and vexed beyond measure; and the worst of it is that I cannot help myself."

Looking at him half-sadly, she saw the lids droop over his eyes in a listless sadness more touching than mer words could have possibly been. All that pitying tenderness which is so deep and fatnomless in woman's nature arose within her at the sight. She that pitying tenderness which is so deep and fathomless in woman's nature arose within her at the sight. She fergot all her proud scorn a few moments before, and sat silent, looking down at the graceful figure at her feet, with her soul shining in those splendid eyes, until suddenly the dark eyes of the young man, glancing upward, met and held that burning glance. A moment she gazed as if fascinated, then her dark eyes wavered and fell, while a burning crimson overspread her face. But in that fleeting moment heart had spoken to heart, and, with a frightened, delicious, rapid heart-throb, she suddenly realized how earnestly she loved him, and, with a suppressed cry, dropped her face into her hands.

"Rose, dear Rose!" came_to herears in a tremulous, ecstatic, passionate murmur.

ears in a tremulous, ecstatic, passionate murmur.

There was no answer. He caught one of the little hands away from her face and pressed it reverently to his lips. In a moment she drew it away, ostensibly to put back a ringlet that had fallen over her face, then she suddenly rose to her feet, and took up her wide straw hat from the grass.

'It is almost sunset," she said, in the most matter-of-fact tone possible, "and I have had no dinner."

Victor, arose, too, and stood waiting in absolute silence while she knotted the rosy ribbons under her dimpled chin.

the rosy ribbons under the chin.

She looked cold, and reserved, and unpleasantly proud to the young man, whose heart was still pulsating wildly with the joy of the revelation he had surprised in those tender eyes. He began to wonder if he had mistaken their meaning, or if she were inclined to connecty.

She smiled slightly, and began to draw on her gloves, while Victor gathered a handful of pebbles and tossed them into the water, idly watching the widening circles around them.

watching the widening circles around them.

"Rosamond," he uttered, musingly, "what a difference your coming to 'Le Refuge' bas made in my life."

She took one of the pebbles from his hand and threw it far out into the middle of the stream.

"Like that," she said, with a faint laugh, as they watched the circles widen, then decrease until they were obliterated altugether: "and some day I shall drift out of your life entirely, just as that little pebble disappeared, and leave not even a memory in the hurrying stream of your life."

"Nay," he said, half sad, half gay.

"You are a poet, but I can give you a prettier and more truthful simile than that."

He plucked a deep, blue violet that prettier and more truthful simile than that."

He plucked a deep blue violet that nestled shyly on the soft green turf and tossed it on the water where the pebble had gone down. It made a tiny ripple on the crystal wave, then floated gently down the stream beyond the sight of their watching eyes.

'Need I explain?' he asked.

'If you please.'

'Then, Rose, whatever comes to divide us hereafter, your memory will be like that fragrant blossom flowing down the current of my life, borne on its bosom in storm or calm forever, until it drifts into the great ocean of eternity.

said, in a gentle voice, as she turned to go:

"Forgive me if I undervalue my place in your esteem. I have all my life been so accustomed to having no one to care for me, that it is not so strange that I should be skeptical regarding the durability of all professions of affection."

"Oh, Rose, if you only knew——"
She interrupted him, waving her little hand almost imperiously.

"There, Victor, you need not explain. I will take it for granted that you entertain the most brotherly affection for me. Now let us go."

She was all reserve and coldness again.

Again.

Victor made one more effort to break through the icy barrier she was trying to build between their loving bearts.

"Rose, have you ever found me un-worthy of being your brother, that you speak so lightly?"
"No, I never have. I hope I never

"No, I never have. I hope I never shall."

She had turned to go, and Victor walked on by her side in silence. Netther spoke on the homeward way. He walked on by her side when she entered the house, and they passed down the hall together.

"How beautiful," Rosamond said, suddenly, pausing to look at a bouquet that was placed on a stand in the hall in a fragile crystal vase.

She took it in her hands to admire it. The flowers were nearly all white with here and there a vivid bit of scarlet geranium, verbena or rosebuds, and a perfect fringe of scarlett fuchsias wreathing it round, the whole of it nestled in feathery green leaves.

"Who arranged it, I wonder?" she said, turning to Victor. "I did not know that anyone in the house possessed so much taste. Is it not exquisite?"

"Lovely," answered Victor, calmly, "I admired it some time aro, It was

"Take your flowers with you," he called after her.

If she heard him she did not answer. She only ran up the steps a little faster, and went into her room, closing the door after her.

Doctor Elliott called at "Le Refuge" the next evening, and was deeply mortified at seeing his charming bouquet still wasting its sweetness in the nail. As he was accompanied to make her appearance in the drawing room, though she would not have done so had it been otherwise, as she was not in the halt of making one of the group in the drawing room when gentlemen visited the house. But this evening she was brought more into notice than she liked, Dr. Elliott addressed his conversation pointedly to her, opened the piano, and entreated her to sing his favorite song, and, as she was too lady-like to refuse, and possessed a voice of rare sweetness and power, she attracted much attention from several gentlemen who were frequent visitors, being ardent admirers of Miss Reeves.
