HOW TO BE A GENT.

I—At the Bar.

Through the courtesy of the publishers we are enabled to present to our readers these extracts from advance sheets of "The Perfect Gentleman; or Rungs in the Ladder to Social Success."

The preface states that "the market is already provided with handbooks of etiquette for women, who are naturally refined, and instinctively well-mannered. The process is a dearth of any standard woolens profess to believe that some of their customers to buy the bulk of their fall goods earlier this year than for several years past, due partly to the expectation of a better state of trade, and partly to the belief that higher values may previse destremely busy on American orders, and are very firm on quotations, while manufacturers of domestic cottons and woolens profess to believe that some stiffening in prices is quite likely. "This work," the writer states, "has been the results of years of loving thought and study," and in the most interesting chapter, that on "Cafe, Sample-Room and Barroom Demeanor," occur the following suggestions:

You should remember that when you have invited anyone to drink with you are, for the time being, his host. Therefore, it devolves upon you to open the door and give him precedence. If he, as he should, reciprocates in the matter of drinks, do not forget that at that moment the relations are radically changed, and you must assume the role of guest.

When you, in the capacity of host, receive your check, either hold it in your palm, or quietly turn it down on the bar. It is extremely bad form to sillow your friend to know what his obligation to you is.

Remember always that "perpendicular," or bedroom drinking is supposed to be for mutual enjoyment, and try as far as possible, to make each place that you visit brighter and happier than it would be without your presence.

In order to do this, you feel compelled to tell a funny story—try to think of one that is funny, tell it quickly, and to come that is funny, tell it quickly, and to come that is funny, tell it quickly, and to come the tast is funny, tell it quickly, and to come that is funny, tell it quickly, and to come that is funny, tell it quickly, and to come the tast of the coming autumn, and much interest is therefore evinced in the state of the crops both in Ontario and Manitoba. The hay crop is said to be poor west of Toronto, but the yield will likely be large in the east. A good yield of coarse grains is expected in Ontario, but wheat will not be a large crop and probably seems to be expected. . . . There is a slight depression in prices of export cate the coming autumn, and much interest is therefore evinced in Ontario, but when a considered to be proof west of the coming autumn, and much

Provisions weak at the opening, but soon turned strong when it developed that but little July pork or ribs were for sale. Several packers in their afforts to change their July contracts to September narrowed the preiums, and this bullish in fluence was followed by considerable buying by both the local and outside trade, causing a good advance. The closing was firm at best prices for the day.

There is no improvement in the legitimate situation, but the speculative feeling is bullish, and will probably carry the market higher.

A message from Chicago to W. J. Anderson & Co., to-day, says: All the big carrying houses bought July wheat. Predictions of frost in the Northwest tonight make sellers cautious and the price is therefore well sustained. Clews was a buyer, thought to be on French
