Notices of "For Love of Country"

The sea-fights are portrayed with a graphic power well-nigh unexampled in American fiction, while the new view of Washington in the famous Trenton and Princeton campaign gives the book historical importance. — Army and Navy Journal.

There is some good sea-fighting under Paul Jones and other commanders, a graphic description of the crossing of the Delaware and the subsequent campaign of Trenton and Princeton, and the inevitable love story. . . . The book is clean, wholesome, and spirited, and deserves well of the public. — The Dial.

Throughout its action rings the true patriotism; and the changing panorama of sea and land, the stirring fights, and the gallant men and lovely women who figure in the story, will repay both the reader who likes to have his love of his native land fired by a recital of the deeds of its heroes, and the one who finds pleasure in reading a stirring account of adventures. — Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

A vigorous specimen of American historical fiction. . . . It is first of all a patriotic story, and the patriotism is not of the blustering sort, but is founded on high ideals of character and conduct in private and public life. — "DROCH" in Life.

The campaign of Washington against Howe in New Jersey, the battles of Trenton and Princeton, are described with accuracy and in detail. The chapters describing these events have more than ordinary historical value. . . . The loyalty of men on both sides to love, friendship, and duty gives honor to humanity and credit to the author. The whole tone of the book is that of noble feeling. — Boston Transcript.
