

GOING HOME.

Ned had begun to enjoy an income of his own earning, and has nearly realised his self-imposed task of clearing off the remains of his father's debts. He is steady and diligent, and strongly attached to his early friend, Arthur; who, after completing his university course, has nearly finished his studies for the Church, and endeavours to repay the good he had received from Katie by trying to exercise an influence for good over her brother.

Arthur and Clara Winstanley, Ned, and James Egan have very different destinies before them, and are likely to move in very different spheres; but they have each benefited, in no small degree, by Katie Johnstone's cross, and the way in which it was borne.

THE END.
