BRITAIN PLANS EASY HOUSEWORK

Women Want New Homes With American Devices

Electric Cooking—Central Heating and Communal Washing Systems Favored by Committee

London, April 8.—(Correspondence)—British women are tired of pottering round in the old-fashioned houses of the country. They cannot strike against the way they have to carry out under-laboring conditions, but they intend to see that the new homes constructed in the future have all American labor-saving devices included in their design. The government, at the request of the women's societies, appointed a committee of women representatives of all classes to go into the details of the home from the housewives' standpoint. This committee has just issued its final report. The committee's recommendations if carried out will cause a revolution in women's work in the home, and the British housewife will for the first time look forward to a life containing an opportunity for leisure.

The women who served on the committee have a vision of the coming time when electricity will be generally used in the home for lighting and cooking. They claim that the problems of heating, hot water supply, cooking, washing and drying can be solved by electric power, and that the general use of the electric current would render half the domestic work now performed, unnecessary.

Central heating is also advocated as a saving of labor. At present, not a house in a thousand in the United Kingdom is fitted with central heating, while practically all rooms other than kitchens are warmed by open fires. In connection with the provision of supplies of hot water the committee has tested many appliances and now gives its support to a system consisting of a combination water heater and storage cylinder, which is adaptable for either gas, oil, or coal heating. It contains two storages, one for domestic purposes and a larger one for baths. This heater raises five quarts of water to boiling point in eight and a half minutes at a cost of one cent, with the price of gas at $125 per thousand feet.

The committee is of the opinion that all provision for cooking purposes should be placed in the scullery and not in the living room, as is generally the custom. It asks that the means should be made for the purpose of deciding the best system of providing a back to back fire that can be switched into the living room after cooking has finished for the day. It considers that a radiator should be the warming apparatus for the living room until the hour the family uses it as a sitting-room, when a fire should be provided.

Ideal Coal Range.

The ideal coal range is one with a grate which can be used open or practically shut; boiling plate and oven at such a height that stooping is unnecessary, with a warming chamber under the oven; dust retaining ash receptacle, and a boiler capable of heating radiators. The report states that such a stove is on the market, but omits to name the makers. It suggests the possible improvement of this stove by encasing all parts which need cleaning and at the same time the committee expressed the wish that washable tiles should be used for setting and surrounds.

The committee declares the old-fashioned fixed copper as being extravagant in fuel and difficult to clean. It favors a portable iron copper, which must be fitted with a cold water supply and a draw-off tap. The report says: "A certain type of steam-consuming copper has been brought to our notice in which the draught for the fire enters at the lid, where it mixes with the steam. The steam is then conveyed in a pipe at the back of the copper just under the lid, round and down into the fire underneath, producing a much greater heat and yet burning less coal. The front is closed by two close-fitting doors, by which means the draught is prevented from being drawn along the floor and entering the fire from below. Besides the absence of steam, therefore, this copper possesses the advantages of being eco-
