HID ment more than 8 o'clock, and again remout breakfast. Loder covered the distance be-tween Grosvenor aguars and astily-with a haste that only an urgent motive could have driven him to gent motive could have driven him to adopt. His steps were quick and uneven as he traversed the intervening streets; his shoulders lacked their decisive pose, and his pale face was marked with shadows beneath the eyes shadows that bore witness to the sleepless night spent in pacing Chilcote's vast and lonely room. By the curious effect of circumstances the curious effect of circumstances the likeness between the two men had never been more significantly marked than on that morning of April 19, when Loder walked siens the pave-ments crowded with early workers and brisk with insistent news venders already alive to the value of last night's political crisis. The irony of this last element in the day's concerns came to him fully when one newsboy, more energetic than his fellows, thrust a paper in front of him.

"Sensation in the 'ouse, sir! Speech by Mr. Chilcote! Government defeat!"
For a moment Loder stopped and his face reddened. The tide of emotions still ran strong. His hand went in-stinctively to his pocket; then his lips set. He shook his head and walked on. With the same hard expression about his mouth, he turned into Clifford's inn, passed through his own doorway and mounted the stairs. This time there was no milk can on the threshold of his rooms and the door yielded to his pressure without the need of a key. With a strange sensation of reluctance he walked into the narrow passage and passed, uncertain which room to enter first. As he stood hesitating a voice from the sitting room settled the question,

"Who's there?" it called irritably.

"What do you want?"
Without further ceremony the intruder pushed the door open and entered the room. As he did so he drew a quick breath-whether of disappoint ment or relief it was impossible to say. Whether he had hoped for or dreaded Chilcote was conscious.

As Loder entered he was sitting by the cheerless grate, the ashes of yes-eclay's fire showing charred and lyeary where the sun touched them. dreary where the sun touched them. His back was to the light, and about his shoulders was an old plaid rug. Behind him on the table stood a cup, a teapot and the can of milk; farther off a kettle was set to boll upon a off a kettle was set to boll upon a tiny spirit store.

"I don't know. She . I- We did not hit it off. She's gone—went yes-terday." He shivered and drew the rug about him. "Chilcote"— Loder began sternly, Then he paused. There was something in the other's look and attitude that arrested him. A change of expression passed over his own face. He turned about, with an abrupt gesture, pulled off his coat and threw it on a chair; then, crossing deliberately to the fre-She is white as a ghost. She is white as a ghost.

There was a great, change in Loder; his strong imper-turbable face was stirred; he was miowed in both Within a few minutes he had a fire crackling where the bed of dead cinders had been, and, having finished the task, he rose slowly from his knees, wheel his hands and crossed to the table. On the small spirit stove the kettle had boiled, and the cover was lifeing and falling with a tinkling sound. Blowing out the flame, Loder picked up the teapot and, with hands that were evidently accustomed to the task, set about making the tes.

You've settled the first part of the business, but the cold has still to be recknowd with. Dothik the tea. I've something to say to you." He mastered his vehemence and, walking to the window, stood looking down into the court. Chilcote's swallowing, the click of the cup against his teeth.

For a time that seemed interminable he stood motionless; then, when he judged the tea finished, he turned slowly. Chilcote had drawn closer to the fire. He was obviously braced by the warmth, and the apathy that run about him was to some extent dispel-led. Still moving slowly, Loder went toward him and, relieving him of the

"But why?" Chilcote articulated

"But why?" he said again. "Why?"
Still Loder avoided the frightened surprise of his eyes. "Because I withdraw," he answered doggedly. Then suddenly Chilcote's tongue was loosened. "Loder," he cried excitedly, "you can't do it! Great heavens, man, you can't do it!" To reassure himself he laughed—a painfully thin echo of his old sarcastic laugh. "If it's a matter of greater opportunity," he began, "of

But Loder turned upon him.

"Be quiet!" he said so menacingly, that the other stopped. Then by an effort he conquered himself. "It's not a matter of money, Chilcote," he said quietly. "It's a matter of necessity." He brought the word out with difficulty.

Chilcote glanced up. "Necessity?" he repeated. "How? Why?"
The reliteration roused Loder. "Behouse last night," he began hurriedly. "Because when you go back you'll find that Sefborough has smashed up over the assassination of Sir William Brice Field at Meshed and that you have made your mark in a big speech, and because"— Abruptly he stopped. The thing he had come to say—the thing he had meant to say-would not be said Either his tongue or his resolution failed him, and for the instant he stood as silent and almost as ill at ease as his companion. Then all at once in spiration came to him, in the sugges-tion of a wellnigh forgotten argument by which he might influence Chilcote and save his own self respect. "It's all over, Chilcote," he said more quietly.
"It has run itself out." And in a dozen sentences he sketched the story of Lillian Astrupp, her past relations with himself, her present suspicions. It was not what he had meant to say; it was not what he had come to say, but it
