

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

TO BE CONTINUED.
The surgeon felt the patient's pulse and placed his ear upon his breast to listen to the beating of his heart.
"Well?" queried the Governor.
"He is a man of much vigour," replied the surgeon gravely; "and you might force him to swallow one or two measures yet; but the second will kill him."
The first executioner raised another tube, and the second stood with the water.
"Is the man in a condition to hear me?" proceeded the Governor.
"Hear you? Mons Meg might be fired in his ear and he would know nothing of it. There are, however, means of recalling his senses."
"What means?"
"Burn him under the ear with the red irons and put on the boot."
"The irons are in the fire," said the first torturer, "and the boot is yonder, and his foot is bared for it."
The man made a movement as if to prostrate the instruments, when the Governor stopped him by an impatient gesture. An expression of horror and pity was on his countenance.
"Enough, enough for the present," he cried. "I will acquaint his lordship with the result of this test, and we will see what is to be done after. Carry him to his cell, and prythee, Maister Surgeon, attend to him for my sake."
Spens was carried back to his dungeon by the men-at-arms, and the surgeon, who had been struck by the fortune of the victim, set about reviving him with interest in the task.
He at first began to entertain doubts of effecting a cure, but at the end of several hours he had succeeded in drawing off the greater part of the water which had been forced into the patient's stomach, and he trusted to the profuse perspiration which overspread the body to prevent suffusion on the lungs.
"I predicted how it would be," muttered the Governor as he proceeded to seek Angus; "you man is one of those who die and speak not."
CHAPTER XXV.—THE NEW LORD OF BINRAM.
Still worse than apathy had place
On his swart brow and callous face:
For evil passions cherished long
Had plough'd them with impression strong.
All that gives gloss to sin, all gay
Light folly, passed with youth away.
But rooted stood in manhood's hour,
The weeds of vice without their flower.
Angus was in the Council Chamber waiting the issue of the test. He paced the floor moodily, and his only companion, the sallow-faced man who had recently become his prime agent and counsellor, sat near the table watching him cunningly.
"If we fail to bring this conspiracy home to Arran," muttered the Earl, "You may bid good-by to Binram, for I shall have no power to obtain it for you."
He smiled grimly.
"I do not despair of winning the game, even if his lordship pass through the fire scathless."
"You are sanguine," replied the other with a sneer.
"Because I know your position, and I know that the simplest stratagem will give you the hand of—"
"Stop; here is our friend!"
The Governor entered the chamber at the words, and acquainted his lordship with what had taken place.
"Humph, I would that the obstinate churl had been on my side instead of Arran's," muttered Angus dissatisfied.
"You have discovered all, then," said the Governor venturing the question in the hope of avoiding a repetition of the unpleasant duty he had just performed.
"Yes, all, without being able to prove anything."
"You do not desire, then, that the test should be applied again?"
"I will tell you in six days hence how her Majesty may desire to dispose of him. Come harras."
The Earl and his dark agent withdrew from the chamber to another part of the Castle.
Since the attempt to carry off the King their Majesties had removed from Holyrood to the Castle as a place of greater security against attack or conspiracy than the Palace. The Queen Regent had been for some time aware that the preference she had shown Douglas, however carefully guarded, was observed by her nobles, and filled them with alarm. The dislike which was general amongst them in their regard of Angus became strengthened by the favour he obtained in her eyes, and the distrust stretched even to herself.
She felt that her position was critical; but whether the attempt to remove her royal son from her guardianship frightened her out of that calmness of judgment which she had displayed on ordinary occasions, and rendered her so anxious to obtain a protector who would be bound to her by closer ties than those of loyalty or interest, or whether she was blinded by her liking for the man, in the moment of peril she took the step she should have most avoided.
TO BE CONTINUED.

MAIRLAN—A pamphlet has just been published by the Rev. John Lang, of Colburn, on the subject of "Marriage with a Sister of a deceased Wife." No matter what views may be held respecting the much-talked-of question, a perusal of this pamphlet cannot fail to prove interesting. Mr. Lang goes into the question at considerable length, and sustains his position by an abundance of scriptural passages. The book is well worth reading.
