

HELEN MOIR

OR— LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE VOYAGE AND ITS TERMINATION. But the question was—could the vessel be kept afloat till the steamer came near? The water had now risen to a great height in the hold, and the ship was beginning to lurch more heavily, giving token that she was settling.

The men eagerly watched the latter's face, and it read the satisfying truth that the water was not gaining so rapidly as it did, and the hope increased that the steamer would be alongside in time.

All this while Jaquin and Dubosque stood silently apart, putting no hand to the work of preservation, but occasionally whispering together as the prospect of deliverance increased.

Which it did very obviously now, for the steamer came steadily and rapidly towards them, and through his powerful glass Captain Bousell made her out to be a Dutch steam packet, bound probably for Rotterdam or Amsterdam.

How can we describe the emotion of Brillnorth and Helen as the expectations of deliverance grew in their hearts? The salvation which was coming to those on board was a double salvation to them, for once on board the steamer, they would claim the captain's protection, and denounce Jaquin and Dubosque as the authors of the outrage from which they had suffered so much.

Helen's fluttering heart trembled under the hope renewed after such suffering of dark despair, and thrilling hopes of Heaven filled her soul. What eyes of longing eagerness she fixed on the advancing vessel, and how fervent was the prayer she uttered, that it might come in time to save them.

"My God, how does she stand now?" asked the captain as the man once more came up from below.

"Only half an inch higher," was the cheery reply, made loud enough for all to hear, and intended to encourage the men at the pumps to increased exertion.

A burst of hurrahs followed the cheering and applause, and the captain's eye gleamed with satisfaction and joy.

Just then Dubosque joined him at the stern.

"Bousell," said the Frenchman, "it is fine the girl and her father were sent below."

"Sent below?" repeated the captain, with surprise. "Why should they go below when, it is to be hoped, we shall all quit the ship in less than half-an-hour?"

"That is just the reason," returned the other. "Don't you see that as things have turned up we require to act boldly and promptly?"

"Speak out, Monsieur Dubosque, and let me know what you are driving at."

"I will, for we have not a moment to lose. Your vessel will be at us directly."

"Well?"

"If they are taken off with us, have you reflected what the consequences will be?"

"No; what?"

"Their first act will be to denounce us to the captain of your steamer, and we shall be brought to account for the doings of this voyage."

"Ah! I see, and to prevent that you would have them confined below, and left to go down with the vessel."

Dubosque nodded, and the captain's face flushed darkly red.

"Monsieur Dubosque," he sternly replied, "the matter I agreed to assist you in was not a matter of murder, else you had never obtained the cooperation of Jules Bousell. It was no great harm to help you to a pretty girl and an heiress, but to take the lives of two innocent people is a different thing, and I won't listen to it for a moment."

"Then we are all ruined."

"Perhaps not. I have taken the measure of this man, and count him honourable and one to be trusted. I'll bargain with him for our safety."

"Oh, he'll promise anything here. Would you be fool enough to believe him?"

"Yes," answered the captain shortly, and he strode across the deck to where Bridgenorth and Helen stood.

"Monsieur Bridgenorth, a word with you," was his abrupt address.

The latter turned in silence towards him.
