The Foster Brother:

The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER XV.

"But it is not impossible that it may," riced George, anxiously.
"Cartainly not. I told that man what had written to you, that if he had a serious illness or if anything happened to min to greatly disturb his physical system, the result would not only possibly but robably be his return to consciousness and sanity; and upon my word, I fancied hat the man did not relish the prospect, emote and faint though it was."

"You did not tell him that I had ritten about Walley?" said George, agorly.

casedy.

"Of courses I did not. You charged me, you know, to mention it to no one."

"" That is fortunate," returned George.
"I am utterly at a loss to imagine what reason he can have to feel interested in Walley, but the fact may be highly important to me. I should like to go aft and take a good look at the man."

"Well do it," said Manby: "he is an inside passenger, and has not seen me, though I noticed him in the parlour of the Black Bull before we started. It may be as well that I keep out of his sight, for if he got his eyes on me he would recognise me as the doctor of the asylum; and though I don't know why, yet it may be of importance that he should not see me—and in your company—so sauther aft by yourself and take your observations. You will just have time to do it before the vessel is at the side of the pier."

In pursuance of this reccommendation, George walked slowly and with the air of one whose motives had no set purpose, towards that part of the boat where the man in question stood by himself gazing at the wooded shores of the coast which the vessel was approaching. He was absorbed in his own thoughts, and paid no heed to what was going on around him. George had therefore an opportunity of making him the object of his sipse and steady inspection.

The impression he received was not favorable. The countenance, to begin with, had a herd sinister expression, which the large hawked nose helped to deepen, as well as to give the additional idea of force of will and pertinacity of purpose. A planning, plotting, overreaching man, George con'd not help thinking him to be—crafty, unprincipled, and unscrupulous—coarse and calculating—selfish and overbearing.

All this might be fancy and imagination on George's part—due greatly, if not entirely, to his unknown, his mysterious connection with the maniac; and it is quite possible that if the youth had come across the man, without having any motive for specially regarding him, he might have failed to detect such evil characteristics of nature in him.
