Baptist Convention Passes a Resolution of Congratulation.

Friday's Session Devoted to Educational Work.

The Baptist University and Colleges Flourishing.

Interesting Statistics—Ontario's School System Praised—The McMaster Estate—Stirring Educational Addresses—Hon. John Dryden Here.

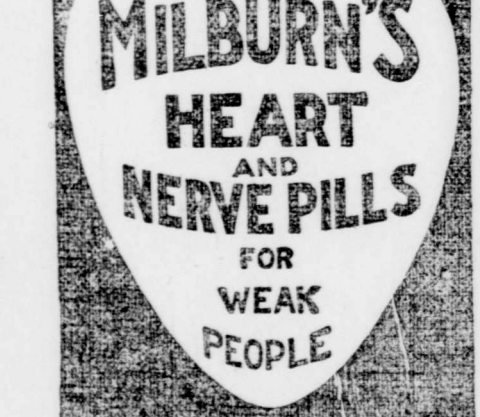

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

The afternoon was devoted to a review of the educational work of the church at McMaster University and Woodstock and Moulton Colleges. The report of the senate and board of governors was presented by Chancellor Wallace, and is full of interest not only to the Baptists of Canada, but to the Canadian people as a whole. The total enrollment of students for the year 1896-97 is 424, divided as follows: Theological, 46; arts, 113; Woodstock (boys' college), 122; Moulton (ladies' college), 139, an increase in every department over the preceding year excepting in the case of Woodstock, which has 15 less this year than last. Among the theologians was one lady student, while in the arts department there is a steadily increasing number. The ladies attending McMaster University have the privilege of residence at Moulton College. Woodstock College forms a natural feeder for McMaster, the majority of the graduates going to that university. During the year Prof. Bates, for many years principal of Woodstock, was removed by death, and Prof. A. L. McCrimmon, a young man of marked ability, succeeded to the principalship. The discipline maintained at the school has been almost perfect, and the academic work of the highest class. To the regular academic course has been added a department of manual training, which has proved highly successful, and is especially appreciated by boys contemplating the pursuit of engineering and kindred occupations.

At Moulton the aim is to give to young ladies the same broad, vigorous manual training as is accorded the boys at Woodstock, and to prepare them for the university. The department carried forward to Sept. 29, 1897, and based on estimates from May 29 to Sept. 29, shows a net saving of nearly $2,000 each in the university proper and in Moulton and Woodstock. The figures for the year are as follows: University—Disbursements, $12,402.55; receipts, $10,886.28; net expenses, $1,516.27. Moulton—Disbursements, $13,047.51; receipts, $9,523.08; net expenses, $3,524.43. Woodstock—Disbursements, $16,082.00; receipts, $12,554.43; net expenses, $3,527.57.

The treasurer's report for the year ending Sept. 29, 1896, showed a deficit balance against the current account of $3,391.44, and as the saving this year has been effected without any impairment of efficiency, the result is highly gratifying. The total net expenses last year were $34,086. This year they will be only $22,183.

Some interesting figures are given relative to the McMaster estate, in a report of the committee on investments, after a special investigation of the securities made by two of its members. When the balance sheet was audited by the executors on Sept. 22, 1887, it was valued at $24,173.02, only $74,841.49 being in cash. The balance consisted of bank and company stocks, mortgages and other securities, real estate and personal property. After deduction of Mrs. McMaster's interest in Moulton, and paying about $12,000 of the deceased, there remained $889,449. Much of the real estate and mana life there was no excuse for any young man going without an education. They might have to work hard, but this was not a lotus-eating realm of dreamy ease. "Have a mind as firm as your heart is devoted," he said. Anderson's passion for practicalness was another trait on which the speaker gleamed. Speaking of the president's aversion to sermons that did not reach the people, Mr. Villiers said the age of sermons of "musty lore expressed in turgid sentences is largely passed away. The ministers today are not so much in danger from paralysis of the brain as from failures of the heart." After speaking of President Anderson's devotion and other traits, the speaker referred to Christ, and said: "Acquaint yourselves with him. Find in his humanity a visible peg on which to hang your conception of an invisible God."

A London Girl Creates a Stir in a New York State Hospital.

Refuses to Attend a Drunk and is Suspended from the Nurses' Training Class.

A dispatch from Middletown, N. Y., says: The suspension of Miss Marie Denahy, a member of the training class of nurses at Thrall Hospital, in this city, is the cause of a lively feud between the nurses and Miss J. M. Morrison, the superintendent.

Miss Denahy is a pretty Canadian girl, whose home is in London, Ont. She has been suspended for three months, and compelled to return to her home, because of disobedience to hospital orders. All the nurses who have been informed that if they persist in championing her cause they will be dismissed from the institute.

Miss Denahy has several times been called upon to nurse a wealthy young man suffering from alcoholism. When finally ordered to go to the patient's home she objected, declaring that he should have a doctor's attention. Miss Morrison ordered her to go. She went, but returned to the hospital next morning, the young man's family asserting that she had acted disgracefully. The board of managers then suspended her. She declared she would not return to her home, but remain in town and do private nursing. This the board refused to allow, and she was compelled to leave the town last night.

With a single exception Miss Denahy's associates in her class are united in accusing the superintendent of being too strict a disciplinarian. The male members of the advisory board side with the superintendent, but Miss Denahy has the support of the medical staff and many patrons of the institution.

The superintendent, fearing she would not be able to sustain the discipline of the institution, has tendered her resignation, which has not been accepted, but she has been granted a three months' vacation. Miss Denahy has served fifteen months of the sixteen required to obtain a graduate's certificate.

BURIED AT SEA.

Death of Miss Margaret McNeil on Board the Steamer Scotsman.

The Toronto Mail and Empire of yesterday publishes a communication from a passenger on board the steamer Scotsman, dated May 19, which says:

"At 12 o'clock (midnight) one of the steerage passengers, Miss Margaret McNeil, who hailed from London, Ont., and was being sent home to Ireland by the King's Daughters, died from consumption. She was so weak that she was carried on board ship, and also from the train to the wharf. This was a case, it is claimed, that should not be repeated, for several reasons. First, it was very risky for an invalid to take passage in such a weak state; second, it entails greatly increased work upon the ship's company, and, although this is rarely undertaken by them, it is not fair to other passengers, who may be deprived of the attention that might be expected; third, as it is well known that consumption is an infectious disease, the isolation of such passengers; fourth, it invalids are to travel by steamship, they ought not to go in the steerage, and should have someone to accompany them."

On Monday morning the word was passed around that there was to be a burial at sea. The Highlanders were ordered to stand at attention. Rev. Mr. Gardner, who read the burial service, which was begun at 11:40 a.m., was on a slide, having been prepared by being seen up in canvas, with the Union Jack over his head, and was in the water's edge. The engines stopped, and the body was lowered into the water's edge, and when that part of the service was reached, "Part to earth," the following substituted: "We commend her body to the deep," which occurred at 11:43 a.m. The slide was pulled up, and the first signal, and every person went on with their ship's life as if nothing had happened. The noon watch was latitude 55.5, longitude 131; run, 238 miles."
