BERTHA GALLAND A DAINTY DOROTHY

Pleased a Fashionable Audience at the Grand in a Romantic Drama.

"Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," dramatization, by Paul Kester, of Charles Major's well known historical novel, was presented by Miss Bertha Galland and company at the Grand last night. The audience, though not large, was a fashionable one, and it accorded a personal triumph to Miss Galland upon her first appearance in London. The theme of the play is well known to all — a regulation Charles Major theme, with history and princesses and queens and scheming courtiers and swords, and love-making, all mixed up in a construction which, de spite all its defects, is nevertheless in-

It being Miss Galland's first appear ance in London she was watched with more than usual interest by critical theater-goers, and the verdict was that her New York reputation was well sustained. As the renowned Dorothy, he brilliant emotional work completely captivated the audience. Her artistic interpretation covers the most difficult moods, ranging from petulant fits of temper to the most intense and passionate love scenes. Her dramatic art exceeds her elocution, however, and if any fault is to be found with her work it is in the rapidity with which she delivers certain sentences, enunciation being slightly defective at such times. But she is altogether nost charming actress, and her im personation of the sprightly Dorothy is such as does one good to see. The supporting cast includes Miss Mayme Stafford, of Montreal, daughter of Mr. Harry Stafford, the well-known shoeman, and lover of amateur sport Miss Stafford, who appeared on the programme as Helen Ford, played the part of Mary Queen of Scots, and her accomplished ittle, sad, dethroned queen, proved one of the treats of the evening. Miss Stafford is a young lady of exceptional grace and beauty, and her histrionic powers are such as to place her on level with the brilliant star, Miss Galland. While in the city she was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Pocock, they being close personal friends of the charming actress. All the other members of the company gave satisfaction The play was magnificently staged the palaces and gardens being equal to the finest culminations of stage raft yet seen at the Grand. The incidental music rendered by Professor Creswell's orchestra was also pleasing, classified as one of the very best dra-
