From Brazil, from the granite quarries of the district of Santos, comes the report of a newly-discovered butterfly. The wings of this insect so exactly match the color of freshly-cu: granite that, at rest on the rock, it is practically invisible. Moreover, its instinct leads it always to alight on the surface where it matches, never on a weathered or moss-grown rock, against which it would easily be seen. Thus the butterflies are able to elude their numerous enemies.

Of course, this sort of protective coloration is common enough among insects. We have in the United States scores of species that match very accurately treebark or green leaves or bright flowers. The remarkable thing about this case is that the Santos quarries have been worked for only about 200 yards. The adaptation of the butterfly to the color of quarried rock and the instinct to use this resemblance for concealment have both appeared within this short period; a striking illustration of the speed with which nature can work when she tries.—Saturday Evening Post.
