

hair that ever grew. It was so very pretty, it seemed almost wicked to take it from its shelter, but we hardened our hearts and soon had a lovely boxful. Here we had breakfast, which never tasted so nice before; afterwards we wandered at leisure in two's and three's, some reading close to the water's edge and others gathering the wild flowers that grew in sweet confusion here, there and everywhere. Not until late in the evening did we leave the beautiful garden of Eden and turn with slow and thoughtful steps, each silent in her own reflections, back to the hotel.

Once more we glided over the waters. Now it was dark, the great moon shone overhead, dipping its reflections here and there, and everywhere the stars were in twinkling myriads.
