

It is quite likely that there will be some slight demur to all this. Indeed, it may not be very rash to surmise, that if peace be proclaimed in Europe, we shall find the Pierce administration resting content for awhile with the diplomatic triumph which they have achieved by such a vast display of learning and acuteness, and willing to leave for a more fitting opportunity the task of enforcing a complete submission to these doctrines. 323