war; and of our being able to compel our enemies to the neceflity of accepting fuch a peace, as a British King shall think reasonable to give. This, and this only can fix our security for EVER on a firm basis.

( 32 )

Let us but follow the blows already given to our enemies, and there will in a fhort time be the fairest expectation, not only to get out of all difficulties, but to reduce their dangerous power within due limits for a long time to come. Nothing but our own impatience can hinder us now from what they prevented once before, by the fame arts, in a parallel conjuncture. Let any man lay his hand upon his heart and fay if (after the approaching peace is made on the terms as they are reported) we are ever to expect, or can always avoid a war with France? --- And when he has answered, that the growth and ambition of the French power, her breach of treaties, her rival-fhip in trade, the natural antipathy and jealoufy of the two nations, must bring it unavoidably upon us in a fhort time; let him then confider whether there can be any fense left in the people of England, if they are not earneitly defirous to push on the prefent war with the utmost vigour, now we ftand in a fituation in which we can hardly hope to find ourfelves again, in order to effectually humble our enemies, and compel them
