ful, and confequently the fafeft from foreign danger. Hence arole a competition for territory; the great parent of numbers, wealth and power, and conftant object of their wars.

Towards the end of the 15th century, the powers of Europe were, in general, They contented themfelves with poor. the necessaries, without the luxuries of life. Their refources were fmall. Their countries produced no gold or filver, and their trade was too limited to afford any confiderable fupply. Commerce was monopolized by the Genoefe and Venetians. They had, moreover, for a long fucceffion of years, haraffed each other in their contefts for dominion, without gaining any important fuperiority. The difcovery of a new world beyond the Atlantic, uncultivated, almost uninhabited, and altogether defenceles, gave to their policy a different pursuit, while it retained the fame objects in view. They faw that by colonifing they could extend their dominions, and obtain an increase of subjects, commerce, and
