"Now, Jack, for the fun. What is it to be? This weather is depressing, and every one is going out of doors for the summer. If Terry were only here we would need nothing else."

"Yes, we would. What about Nettie? You think he has been gone three weeks and you have not forgotten him yet."

"That makes me think of him more. Men are such a rare production of nature."

"Treason, Zell, treason."

"Well for the fun."

"Let us give a grand Venetian scene in the garden and conservatory."

"Where would you get the water, Jack?"

"Never thought of that, Zell, but I don't care, let us have it without water. Just a grand masque, and you wear the mask."

"Oh! that will be splendid. I can wear the dear old dress again and imagine I am at the Tarn. It will be worth the trouble to wander around in that dress again with you, Shen, will it not?"

"If you are not going to wander around with me, Zell, I want you to give me a grand masque—now, now."

"Never mind him, Shen, we will give it without him."

"I would love to see thee as I know thee at the Tarn. Yet thou art better, more than any knowledge, than thou art winning as of old. Then art like a drop of cool water to the fevered mouth. The masque is to be desired."

"Shen says yes, Jack. Get the cards out as early as possible that it will be well attended."

CHAPTER XV.

THE NIGHT OF THE MASQUE.

The large garden was all the public dream in light and shade. All invitations had been accepted and the guests were waiting for the start.

There were a number of very nice parties, and the guests were waiting for the start.

"Will you please find Jack for me, Shen, he may choose me with his nonsense. I will wait him in the arbor at the side of the house."

"That did not forget Terry?"

"No, Shen. Will you please find him in two days past the thirty—but go for Jack."

In a few minutes Jack came bounding along the path, whistling gaily. What a stimulant those men are who are so slightly intoxicating to spend half an hour with Jack. Life was so strong and full in him that it was constantly bubbling over, and he was involuntarily absorbed by those who were with him.

"So little woman is in the blues! There are a number of very nice parties, and the guests were waiting for the start."

"Do not talk so. We will not entertain again until Terry comes. Tell me of Terry, will you, Jack?"

"Do you know, Zell Ambrose, it seems to me you are making a hand organ of me, and you grind out the times that suit yourself, not the public. Now my duty here is to give you a little of what you play about Nettie, and let the old time of Terry become a lost chord!"

"Terry is the best man I know."

"Well, I guess so. Yes, he is a trump. Come, sit down. I will swing the basket hammock so that I may talk of the wandering exile knight as he ought to be talked of—slowly, you know."

"Yes, you said he was a trump, Jack, well?"

"Yes, he is a whole-hearted trump. He went away for no other reason than to give you a chance to fall in love with someone else, my dear."

"You were woman enough to stick to the first love."

"I did not mean that. Please stick to the old time."

"You are insistent on that subject and I will not speak of Terry again this night, I'll be blessed if I will, so there, now."

"Never mind, Zell! Terry will himself. Dear little one, do you know you loved your Terry through and through?"

"From the shadows Terry came to Zell. After that first greeting all were without words for a while. Zell's Terry, her strength, had returned."

"Say, did you bring another goddess with you this time?"

"I had no need to. Zell was waiting for me. And you have a grand party to-night. I have been waiting for you for the guests to do, when you could announce myself, but when you came here and Jack threatened such a masque I had to come forth. What is it, Zell, have you become the silent one? Speak to me, Zell."

"I cannot; it is not enough to be near you and hear your voice. You will not leave me again, will you?"

"Let me tell you, Zell, and you, old boy, I have an idea."

"Are you sure, Jack?"

"Now, don't make fun, Terry. It is not becoming to slow people. I have an idea, and a good one, too. Here goes: Can't you too oldies be married in an old way. To-night and in the garden. The four hundred are here and so is the Bishop. Great guy, Terry, why don't you applaud and say what an abundant idea."

Terry looked questioningly at Zell, and Zell smiled. How well they understood each other.

"Yes, Jack, let it be as you wish. Send them to us, then you make the announcement to the guests. They shall gather, we will have the ceremony in the garden just before this little arbor. It will be more like the Tarn life, will it not, Zell? We will stand alone and Shen will give Zell to me. You understand, Jack?"

"Yes, and I won't be long, either. But, Terry, give me your hand just once in single blessedness. Now that the end has come, I feel quite weak."

The impulsive fellow carried Terry's hand to his lips, then left in search of Shen. Shen came to the arbor, and watched the guests gather around the Tarn. Jack had said a wedding and all were speculating as to who it would be. The bishop came a little later having to send for his surplice and other essentials. He was now waiting, and Terry came from the arbor and took his place, and still they did not know. Terry was never suspected of such a thing. Shen, more sedate and serious than ever before, led Zell to Terry's side. A moment of deep silence ensued, then they seemed to see how things were, and someone, as enthusiastic in their liking for Terry as Jack called out: "Hurrah for Denver's success! The spirit of rejoicing spread, and a genuine cheer followed. A most unfeeling, unpremeditated performance at a wedding. But that cheer spoke volumes and volumes in Terry's favor. The bishop raised his hand and asked for attention."

"You joy at Mr. Denver appearing in this ceremony is quite right, but let me proceed." Solemnly the beautiful site in the Church of England marriage ceremony was read, and Zell was

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CEREMONY IN THE GARDEN.

Terry's wife, Shen was the first to take her hand to wish her well.

"And then art Zell Denver. Thou art now a happy wife my little mountain daisy. Let me wish thee well."

HEM was favorite with all, and his words brought tears to many eyes. One year has gone, Jack is married. Terry and Zell Denver are happy. Some say it is a very practical way. They had not gone for a trip, but just settled down and lived sensibly one whole year. Now in the month of June they were going away to spend the summer—but where? Only those who were going with them knew the where. To his summer residence north of Estabrook, was all the public knew. Shen, Jack and Nettie Boyd, Mrs. Odell another woman and an old friend of Terry's, a Dr. Mowbray, were the guests who had been asked to go with him to the Tarn for the summer. They had all settled at the Tarn, and Terry, with their attendants in the house, the guests at Ishmael's cave. The story of Zell's life was a mystery to all, and long and often had they searched for the records of Ishmael's world but found nothing. One morning Terry and Shen went to watch the sun rise as Zell and Terry so often had done a year before. They were restless and worried, and it was of choice they stood there under the stars.

"Mrs. Denver will see you now, sir," a maid said, and Shen was left alone with Terry in the arbor at the side of the house.

"Terry, will you kiss our baby?"

"My dear little wife," was all he said.

"Terry, will you kiss our baby?"

"My dear little wife," was all he said.

wheel half a ton clear across the city of Shanghai for ten cents.

In this old Chinese town, the city in Shanghai around which a wall was built a thousand years ago, we see all the industries carried on in the most primitive style. There is a man pounding copper into a sheet, legs are being saved by hand, and hand looms are weaving silk.

Carpenters, blacksmiths and masons work for $2.50 a week, and assist on rice and a little peanut oil and fish. Rice is worth 15 cents per bushel, and 30 cents worth will feed a Chinaman for a month.

The Chinese tailor will make a lady's dress or a suit of clothes $5 cheaper than any other tailor on earth. Hundreds of tourists fit themselves out in China. They use English goods and pay Chinese wages, which are a week for an expert tailor capable of reproducing any garment.

A most superb test of Chinese ingenuity occurred yesterday. A large stonely in our party, with a black and white and hard travelling, had used up her last pair of French corsets. Her many brooks and petting, bones, feet, and unbearable. When my tailor brought back a pair of stonely this morning Mrs. Marsh said jokingly:

"John, you make corsets?"

John took the corset in his hand, examined its difficult mechanism, and said: "Yes, me make corsets."

Mrs. Marsh gave him the sample, and this morning John sailed in softly with his perfect corsets. They were made of lace copies, one in pink and the other in black satin, and fitted to a charm. John's price was $2 for duplicating a $15 French corset.

CHINESE THEOLOGY.

There are so many sects of Christians in China and Japan, each teaching a different belief about Christ, that it is Trinity, that the poor Chinaman is all mixed up. First the Methodists, Baptists and Catholics asked the Chinese worship Christ as God. Then the Unitarians taught that Christ was only a good man, like Buddha. Then Edwin Arnold, the great agnostic, came and said Buddha or Christ, matter, is the "Light of Asia." Going down to Ocean, Mr. Arnold made his adoration for the tooth of Buddha as a relic.

To try to get at the belief of a converted Chinaman, and asked him a few questions, which he answered in plain English.

"John, I said, 'you have heard the preaching of Christians, Unitarians and Agnostics. Now, what do you think about Buddha and Christ—about the Trinity?'"

"Me no save Trinity. Foreign Joss man very curio. Begin time have got one Medical book, and I read it, and I see this fashion: 'Topsyhe (Orthodox Christians) have got the piece Joss, no belong to the piece—being all same one. One piece—all same the piece.'"

"Rimely he show me plover. He have got one book, inside talk all same fashion he show me. I see this fashion: 'Topsyhe (Orthodox Christians) have got the piece Joss, no belong to the piece—being all same one. One piece—all same the piece.'"

"So you embraced Christianity, did you, and then what happened?"

"That Joss man go way, new piece come (Unitarian). He, too, saying Joss man (Unitarian) will sell all same fashion before master. Me no save this piece! He have got one piece as first time Joss man, inside, he read different fashion. He talk no belong to the piece, but I see this fashion: 'Topsyhe (Orthodox Christians) have got the piece Joss, no belong to the piece—being all same one. One piece—all same the piece.'"

CHINESE LITTLE FEET.

To-day there was a great feet in the Chinese garden outside of Shanghai, and was a dragon festival. In the procession was a giant dragon sixty feet long. Here I saw women with all new piece—little feet four inches long, medium feet, and big feet. I saw a no caste connected with little feet. Poor women in obscure and filthy quarters have them as often as the wealthy class. It is simply vanity. It is common to see women in rich-looking under-stumps of feet as ungraciously as a man walking on wooden legs. If it were not for the turban and wheelbarrow, many of them would never go a square from home. They are proud of the feet, and get all over when an American lady notices them.

I have been told repeatedly in China that no Chinese lady ever allowed a photograph taken of her feet. To-day, after buying a Havorthorn vase and a Chinese crane of a rich China merchant, I prevailed upon him to let a Kodak be taken of his wife's little feet. She was very shy, but I said, admiring the little feet, she allowed me to take a photograph of them. He assented after much reluctance. Her feet are only four inches long. I found the four small toes under and entirely embedded in the bottom of the foot. Only the big toe went to the outside of the shoe. It was not like the high bone of a chicken, a triangle of solid flesh and bone. The lady could walk very well, but with a hobbling gait.
