SOIL FOR ROSES.

There is no greenhouse specialty which requires so much skill as the growing of roses, and the magnificent specimens which may be found in the markets at almost any season of the year surprise all other greenhouse products in beauty and perfection. There is no plant which requires so heavily manured a soil as the rose. The customary formula for mixing such a soil is one-third finely pulverized soil, one-third loam and one-third cow manure. In addition to this some form of commercial fertilizer is occasionally applied. Watering the plants with a strong decoction of cow manure is highly impracticable to use a soil of this nature for two consecutive seasons, since, owing to its high state of fertilization and the subsequent chemical changes which take place in the soil, a toxic effect is produced upon the plants. No class of greenhouse specialists are more particular about the texture of the soil when employed in growing the American Beauty. American Beauties are more susceptible to differences in soil texture than other varieties of roses, and a perfectly satisfactory soil for their growth has not as yet been found in this state. The best soil of a different texture from that of the American Beauty is that of the Stone, Massachusetts Experiment Station.
