Posthumous Couquetry. Oh, when, in death, my heart shall break and rest from all its woes; Put, then, some rouge upon my check,

And pencil o'er my brows.

I would, in this my last repose,
As when his vows he paid; Retain upon my cheek the rose, And on my brow the shade. Let no pale winding sheet enshrine My form, when I am dead;

But let my robe of muslin fine Adorn my limbs instead. That dear robe was my dress preferred I wore it on the day When I attracted his regard. And gave my heart away.

And let my laced pillow there, Upon my narrow bed, Decked only with my floating hair, Support my dreamless head, That pitlow, in our nightly rest, Hath both our heads sustained And counted every kiss he pressed On lips still unprofaned.

And place between my fingers slight,
As held by me in prayer,
The rosary, of opals bright,
Our bishop bade me wear.
I still would clasp its cross divine, When in my lonely grave, For sweetest lips have told on mine
