Engagement.

By Willoughby Bates. "So Rob Miller is married! Well, he will find I have noty-broken my heart over his fickleness. I shall accept Mr. Long's offer of marriage." And Polly put down on her desk the letter she had received that morning and proceeded to answer it as follows:

"Dear Mr. Long: I have just received your letter. You may call to-morrow evening for your answer.

evening for your answer.
"Margaret B. Stewart."

"POLLY'S DEVOTED ADMIRER."

"There! That is done," and, sealing it, Polly dispatched the neat maid-of-all-work to the nearest letter-box with the missive.

Polly was proud, and it hurt her very much to have folks hinting that she had been jilted by Rob Müler. had been jilted by Rob Müler.

Before he went away, a year and a half ago, he had been Polly's devoted admirer, and their friends had daily expected to hear of their engagement.
But in June Rob had been sent by the firm which employed him to look after its copper mine in Michigan.

Before he left Rob had said to her:
"I shall be beek in a year dean a year.

Before he left Rob had said to her:

"I shall be back in a year, dear—a year from to-day—and then I shall want an answer to a question I will ask you. Polly, will it be a favorable one?"

And Polly had murmured: "I will wait for you, and shall miss you very much, and be glad when you come back." And Rob had just time to crush her hand in his big, strong one before their friends bore down upon them. And so they parted.

their friends bore down upon them. And so they parted.

Polly sat before the fire so engrossed in thought that she did not hear the bell ring, nor was she aware of the presence of anyone until she heard her own name. Jumping up, she was confronted by a tall young man, who held out his hands to her eagerly.

"Bob" she said flowusly: and then out his hands to her eagerly.

"Rob," she said, joyously; and then she thought of his wife and her manner changed. She ignored his outstretched hands and said, coolly: "How do you do, Mr. Miller?"

"Why, Polly, what does this mean?" said Rob; but Polly kept silent.

"Polly, are you not glad to see me?"

No answer. "Polly, Polly, then it is true what I heard since my return to-No answer. "Polly, Polly, then it is true what I heard since my return to-true what I heard since my return to-night—that you are to marry Long, the banker? I suppose that is why you did not answer my letter."

"What letter?" said Polly, sharply.
"The letter which I sent you last June, when I was in the hospital in Michigan. When I went away did I not say I would be home in a year to ask you-well, never mind. I am too Long got ahead of me. Since I late. Long got ahead of me. Since I was too ill to come, I wrote, thinking that you at least would answer my letter. But you are not glad to see me, so I will go. Good-bye, Polly."
"Rob, where is your wife?"
"Wife" he repeated, puzzled. "I came for her, but find she is promised to another."
Polly began to gry softly. This was Polly began to cry softly. This was too much. What could Rob do but take her in his arms and soothe her, while she told him that she thought he had forgotten her, that she didn't love Mr. Long, and—here she hid her face on his coat—that she did love him? And then, when she looked up, what could Rob do but kiss the lips so near his ewn?

ewn?
By and by, when everything had been explained, Polly said: "Well, what about Mr. Long?"
"Hang Long," promptly replied Rob. But Polly crossed to her desk and wrote a kind little note to Mr. Long telling of her engagement to "Mr. Robert Miller." And the next month, when the pret-ty marriage took place in the little church, one of the handsomest presents bore the card of James Long.

TRUE STORY OF WHITTIER

et's Letter and Souvenir Sent to Klyda Richardson Steege tells in St. Nicholas a true story of the poet Whit-The nursery was bright and tier. cheerful, she begins, and the two children were happy as they listened to a kind voice reading to them. Every day the same old favorites were told or read to the little listeners, who were never tired, but always asked for more. The stories were all about fairies and elves, or boys and girls who had distinguished themselves, or brave soldiers and noble heroes. And the poems were everything in the world from Mother Goose to Shakespeare, But the greatest favorite of all the verses were those which told about Barbara Frietchie. You surely know them, and how when she, though old and gray and feeble, refused to take down her flag, and said as the soldiers marched through Frederickstown: Shoot, if you must, this old gray head, Rut spare your country's flag," she said.

And then how General Stonewall Jackson treated her, and how her flag waved the whole day long over the heads of the passing soldiers, not one of whom uttered a word against it, or its brave defender.

In the old nursery, the children loved this poem, and through it the author, one of the greatest and best of men. as well as a poet of whom our country is justly proud. They talked very often of Mr. Whittier, and at last, one of them evolved, with great labor, from her childish brain, a little verse. It was of little value, no doubt but she was a small child. The answer to the enigma was the Quaker poet's name, and so writing a timid little letter, the child inclosed this first literary attempt and mailed it to Mr. Whittier.

Then followed several days of suspense and anxious waiting. "Would Mr. Whittier think it very strange that she had written and would he call her very foolish?" It was strange how much she cared, but she was the kind of child who always did care about her own schemes rather too much for her own happiness.

At last, one morning, the postman brought a letter for this little girl. Written in violet ink on thin paper, this is what it said: Amesbury, 4th mo. 20th, 1877.

My Dear Young Friend: I thank thee for thy little letter & the ingenious Word Enigma, which is certainly very nicely done.

When Peeling Onions. The pungent odor of the onion is due to a sulphurous oil, which volatilizes rapidly when the tissues of the vegetable is broken in any manner, and especialy affects the delicate membranes surrounding the eyes. This effect, however, can be easily avoided by sticking a small pared potato on the end of the knife with which the cutting is done. A chemical affinity, which cannot be readily explained, but which is none the less satisfactory in its working, attracts the fumes, and their presence is not manifested to the operator till the potato has reached a certain degree of saturation, when it can be readily replaced by another.
