THE OPEN FORUM.

A Widow's Rights.

In your issue of last evening a question was asked regarding the legality of a father laying a claim to one-half of the effects of a deceased son who leaves a widow. We know of a recent case in point. A

We know of a recent case in point. A young man, not many miles from London, died after a few months of happy married life and his young widow was left to fight life's battle alone, her earthly possessions (as she thought) consisting of the furniture of some five or six rooms and a small insurance on her husband's life. In poor health and stunned with grief she had yet to realize the bitterness of being wounded in the house of a friend. She was quickly informed by a legal gentleman that one in the house of a friend. She was quickly informed by a legal gentleman that one half of the wealth (?) left by her husband was claimed by her husband's relatives. There was no redress. The furniture had to be sold, the insurance divided and Shylock is now gloating over his "pound of flesh." Can such things be true?

We are told this is an exceptional case, that the law is very seldom acted upon, unless a large estate is involved; nevertheless it is done. Let the law be amended so that a widow under the same circumstances may not be turned out of house and home to satisfy unserrupulous relatives, determined to have their little "half." They would demand the whole if they could.
