This (April 23) is St. George's Day. By just one regiment in England is the day observed, the Northumberland Fusiliers, known as the old "Fighting Fifth." Today the drums and busbies will be decorated with red and white roses, and the custom is to hold a fulldress parade in honor of the occasion. Every officer and every man who has ever served in the "Fighting Fifth." even though he may have left the regiment years ago, makes a point of wearing a red and white rose on St. George's Day. The other national saints' days are observed to a greater extent in the British army. It. David's Day, March 1, for instance, is kept with much ceremony by the Welsh regiments. In the Royal Welsh Fusiliers the day is especially rembered, the national emblem, the leek, being conspicuous in the festivities, St. Andrew's Day is celebrated to a large extent by the Scottish regiments, and on the 17th of March all the Irish regiments in the army wear a sprig of shamrock. Time when the rules of the service forbade this decoration, while men were on duty, and the matter used annually to form the subject of pertinent questions in the House of Commons put by indignant Irish M. P.s. Queen Victoria, four years ago, removed the grievance forever by granting permission for all Irish troops to wear a sprig of shamrock on St. Patrick's Dav in
