IN THE TIGER'S DEN A managerie-keeper was bemoan-ing his hard fate that his one and only lion had died that morning, when an Irishman approached and asked him for a job.

asked him for a job.
Yes,' said the proprietor, I can give you a job, and an easy one at that. My only lion died this morning, and we've just skinned him. If you wrap yourself in the skin and lie down in the corner of his cage, I'll give you ten shillings a day.'
'Good enough!' cried Pat.
Having been robed in the lion's skin and posed in apparent sleep in the corner of the den, the curtain was drawn, and Pat saw a criticus crowd gaping at him.

the corner of the den, the curtain was drawn, and Pat saw a crious crowd gaping at him.

'Now,' said the proprietor, 'this is a splendid lion from Nubia. He is the king of beasts, and it is astonishing how his mere presence subdues the most ferocious of his fellow wild-beasts. I shall lift the intervening door, and you will see how this noble beast will enter the tiger's den.'

'Here, mister,' whispered Pat, 'I didn't bargain for that!'

'G'on, you fool,' cried the other; 'there is no danger.'

'Im not going in.'

'Well, then, not a penny do you get from me, I tell you the tiger is harmless.'

The prospect of no wages instilled some courage into the poor man, and he made a shuffling movement towards the door of his companion, wild beast.' But one look at the tiger sent him shivering all over as he moaned: 'I cant ge in!'

When the tiger saw his fear, he said in a stage whisper: 'Come in you idiot; I'm an Irishman too!'
