Capt. Marlowe did not recognize him, and he breathed freely again. "Took me for a coachman having a day of," he chuckled. "Well, that's a good beginning." "He crossed Piccadilly, furtively and clambered on top of a 'bus. Two me were discussing politics in front of him, and he overheard his name mentioned in tones of contempt. Their atgument was so unjust that he longed to put them right. Besides, it wasn't true that his po-sition in the cabinet was due to his being an ext. He had worked hard for it. The 'bus took him to Hammersmith, where he got out, wondering where he should go next. An electric tram labelled "Kew" locked inviting, and he joined in the struggle for a sest. The very stout wo man who ahared the sest which he cap-stured told him further that she was going be Gunnersbury to see her married son, who was in the tee trade, and doing well. "I be gour pardon," he muttered. "Learl of the arity was to the lagingthering her hat. "No. I don't know Charley." "You ought to. He's a good sort, you're in the postoffice---" "I didn't say so.

'Traveler?"

Yes; I have traveled." What did you travel for?"

"Do you often go on the terrace: asked Lil. "No," replied the earl. "Not often. Do you?" "I should think not. We've more to do." "It's very lively." "Lor'! You should see it in the summer. They've lovely concerts on then. Sat'd'y's the best day." "Ts that when you come?"
