A PRETTY LITTLE JOB.

In the public accounts from July 1st, 1897, to June 30th, 1898, there are some very interesting items, but not one in the whole book that comes anywhere near this one on page 690, which we propose to enquire into for the benefit of of expenditures for the purposes of the Provincial Board of Health there is this

We say that every vote cast for Mr. Turner and his colleagues is a deadly blow at Victoria; every vote given to them makes the misguided voter an enemy of British Columbia, and an accomplice in Mr. Turner's offence.

All the time that the bill referred to was going through the legislature Mr. McPhillips knew perfectly that grave doubts existed as to his own qualifications to sit; he fought that oill to the full extent of his powers; to prevent its passage he used every argument he could think of. He was a ring-leader in that senseless obstruction. He knew that when he was standing in that house argning against the bill that he himself was perhaps a guilty man, and had no right to assail the characters or motives of other gentlemen. Stick to the truth, Mr. McPhillips, and fight fair, man: a fight won on a foul is worse than a defeat. But it is simply unbelievable that the voters of Victoria will return to the house a man who has made himself the laughing-stock of the province by his vacillation and infirmity

THE CANADIAN POLICY.

Canadians, and it is equally clear that for the country's interest. That choosing no outside inside interference with that policy will be tolerated. The Dingley tariff temporarily blocked the channels of trade in Canada, but the pent-up volume of commerce soon swept along in new grooves, and the result is that today Canada is more independent of her neighbor than at any time in her history. The preferential trade idea of the Laurier government has opened the eves of the people to possibilities never before dreamt of, and the result is expanding revenue, increased business and unbounded confidence in the future. There is no telling what this preferential trade idea may culminate in. We have a large schedule of articles coming in free from the United States, and under the pres-

"You are responsible as a partner if you act like one," is a wellknown axiom of British law. Mr. Turner says the order was sent to the British Columbia Pottery Co., because Turner, Beeton & Co. had no pipe at the time. That is, had the latter firm had any pipe they would have filled the order. Is anything more required than that to show that Mr. Turner's firm did handle this order? They got the pipe from the British Columbia Pottery Co. who, naturally enough, objected to paying freight on it to Nelson. It was none of their funeral; they were merely filling an order for Messrs.
