

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription

Is the best of all medicines for the cure of diseases, disorders and weaknesses peculiar to women. It is the only preparation of its kind devised by a regularly graduated physician—an experienced and skilled specialist in the diseases of women.

It is a safe medicine in any condition of the system. THE ONE REMEDY which contains no alcohol and no injurious habit-forming drugs and which creates no craving for such stimulants.

THE ONE REMEDY so good that its makers are not afraid to print its every ingredient on each outside bottle-wrapper and attest to the truthfulness of the same under oath.

It is sold by medicine dealers everywhere, and any dealer who hasn't it can get it. Don't take a substitute of unknown composition for this medicine of known composition. No counterfeits as good as the genuine and the druggist who says something else is "just as good as Dr. Pierce's" is either mistaken or is trying to deceive you for his own selfish benefit. Such a man is not to be trusted. He is trifling with your most priceless possession—your health—may be your life itself. See that you get what you ask for.

SHEFFIELD.

Sheffield, March 3.—Jarvis Estabrook of Lower Sheffield got a bad fall on the slippery and deceitful ice on the St. John river, and reports say he was picked up in an unconscious condition.

Word comes from St. John that Mr. John F. Estabrook, a Sheffield resident in early life, now one of St. John's respected citizens, is in delicate health, and to all appearances seems to be approaching the end of his days. He is an elder brother of Mr. Hugh Estabrook of Upper Gagetown, and uncle of T. H. Estabrook, tea merchant, St. John.

The flag was flying at half mast yesterday at the Temperance Hall, Upper Gagetown, in respect for the death of one of the deacons of the Baptist church of that village, Deacon William Weston, youngest brother of Captain David and Capt. Samuel Weston, so extensively known as masters of the steamboats on the St. John river. The remains will be laid away on Monday in the public cemetery of Gagetown. The deceased leaves a widow and sons and daughters.

At about the same hour the Angel of Death visited the home of Charles Fulton, youngest son of the late Wm. Fulton, and took the companion of his bosom. Mrs. Fulton had but recently returned with her husband from an extensive tour of California, where she had gone for the benefit of her health, and it was believed that she had greatly improved. Her remains are being interred to-day in the public cemetery at Little River in the family lot. Rev. Mr. Peppers of the Sheffield Methodist circuit, performed the last sad rites.

There was a basket social held in the Sheffield temperance hall last Friday evening under the auspices of the Sons of Temperance. It was an enjoyable affair.

Hiram Bailey, one of our former Sheffield boys, is now controlling a dozen span of horses and a large crew of men in the lumber woods for Smith & Co., Orangetown.

Work on the Newowan high water wharf has been resumed and is being pushed forward by the enterprising foreman, Mr. Geo. Day. To facilitate the work dynamite is being extensively used, the shock from which endangers the safety of the neighboring windows.

McGowan's Landing is now a busy place, with the hauling of lumber and stone.

Fortify now against the Grip—for it comes every season sure! Preventives—the little Candy Cold Cure Tablets—offer in this respect a most certain and dependable safeguard. Preventives at the "sneeze stage" will, as well, also surely head off all common colds. But promptness is all important. Keep Preventives in the pocket or purse, for instant use. Box of 48 for 25c. Sold by all druggists.

The Kiss Of Judas

"Would he? Why?" demanded Lord Edgar.

"Because—are you laughing?" "Laughing!" he responded, drawing nearer the window. "Look at me."

"I thought you were laughing!" Grandpapa gets all his magic out of an old book in the library. And he says that if two persons see a falling star—see it when it begins to fall—that it means ill luck for both of them. "Look!" she exclaimed, suddenly laying her hand on his coat sleeve.

Lord Edgar swung round, and followed with his eyes the indication of her finger, and was in time to see a star fall through the evening sky. "I saw that one. Well?"

"Did you? Well, then, you and I have seen our fate."

"Our fate?" he repeated, gazing up at her as if she were a prophet in her cream dress.

She nodded.

"Yes, I think grandpapa half believes in it, nonsense though it is."

"I hope," he says, "that he will take it that it is our fate to go for a drive tomorrow."

She smiled at him, and slowly pulled a leaf from the stem of the rose which she had taken up from the window sill.

"That would be a very pleasant fate," she said, softly.

"Oh, you must come!" he said, eagerly. "Where shall we go?"

"Hush!" she put her finger to her lips. "You are waking grandpapa; he is asleep now. I must go. Good-night, Lord Edgar!"

"Good night!" he said, and put up his hand.

She hesitated a moment, perhaps suddenly reminded, by pronouncing his name, of the social distance between them; then she slowly extended her hand and let him take it.

"Good night," he said, pressing the soft, white fingers, "good night. Tomorrow I shall come to-morrow morning to know—ask him."

"Now?" looking beyond her into the room.

She flushed slightly, some true instinct telling her that it would be wiser to ask for herself.

"No—I will ask. Good night," and drawing her hand, which for some unexplained reason he had held all this while, she turned and left him.

He stood for a moment looking up at the empty window, then he put down on the sill to shake hands with him.

He seized it as if he were famishing, and roses were good to eat and—as we have no, or say few, pockets in our dress clothes nowadays, he put it gently under his waistcoat, where it made a deep red stain upon his snowy shirt front.

As he walked slowly and reluctantly away, he looked up at the sky.

"Our fate?" he murmured. "Wonder what it is! 'Ill-luck,' she said. Well, I shouldn't care so that we shared it together. Now, why didn't I say that? I always think of all my good things when it is too late to say them! And yet I'm glad I didn't! Every moment I feel that my stupid blundering tongue will slip out something that will—will frighten her. If I did I should see her no more! No, no, she wouldn't understand the fine talk of London drawing rooms. She—ah!" he paused suddenly. "There is another star; whose fate is that, I wonder! Mine alone? Good or evil? What nonsense—and yet it sounds as if when she said it, 'But I'd swear black was white and believe it, too, if she said so! Yes, I'm glad I'm going to stay!' and as he stroked along he put his hand in his waistcoat, fished the rose, and held it against his heart."

Are there no more omens? Have signs and wonders, which used in the old days to be so useful, entirely disappeared and vanished?

I'm afraid they have, with a great many other good things we used to believe in. But if they still existed, the star Lela Temple and Lord Edgar watched together should have fallen into a London drawing room and rolled at the foot of a tall, dark young man who leaned against the wall watching the dancers, for if there existed an evil fate for them, this man was it, and his name was Clifford Revel.

CHAPTER IV.

At the Dance.

At the moment Lord Edgar and Lela Temple were standing at the open window at the Abbey—very much like Romeo and Juliet; if they had but thought of it—Clifford Revel was leaning against the wall of Mrs. Drayton's dining room in Elton Square, Mayfair.

Mrs. Drayton, and Mrs. Drayton's house, and more especially Mrs. Drayton's daughter, were well known in the world of fashion. Who Mrs. Drayton might be, society did not know, and did not, very much care, though it had, at one time, been both curious and suspicious; but that was before a certain prince, who rules society as despotically as the Emperor Alexander does all the Russias, had at a certain ball, asked, with his own royal lips, to be introduced to "that beautiful creature in the amber satin."

The beautiful creature was Mrs. Drayton's daughter, and her fame and fortune were made, her position established from that moment. People no longer cared to ask whether Mrs. Drayton was a widow, and, if so, who and what her husband had been; but they made haste to send her cards for their balls and dinners and at homes, and so helped the ball rolling which the august prince had so amiably started.

To-night was one of Mrs. Drayton's "at homes," and the cards which admitted to it bore the magic word "dancing" in one corner, and "small and early" in the other; in a word, it was a special night, and the small rooms, for the houses in Elton Square were not mansions, were filling with the very best people, and the very best only.

They were not filled yet, and guests were still arriving, and Mrs. Drayton still stood at the door, with her hand apparently extended like a wax figure, to greet each arrival with the meaningless smile which society prescribes for the occasion.

Beside her stood Edith Drayton. It was difficult, it was impossible, to give a portrait of Lela Temple in her simple cream dress; it is not so difficult to know—ask him."

Every moment I feel that my stupid blundering tongue will slip out something that will—will frighten her. If I did I should see her no more! No, no, she wouldn't understand the fine talk of London drawing rooms. She—ah!" he paused suddenly. "There is another star; whose fate is that, I wonder! Mine alone? Good or evil? What nonsense—and yet it sounds as if when she said it, 'But I'd swear black was white and believe it, too, if she said so! Yes, I'm glad I'm going to stay!' and as he stroked along he put his hand in his waistcoat, fished the rose, and held it against his heart."

Are there no more omens? Have signs and wonders, which used in the old days to be so useful, entirely disappeared and vanished?

I'm afraid they have, with a great many other good things we used to believe in. But if they still existed, the star Lela Temple and Lord Edgar watched together should have fallen into a London drawing room and rolled at the foot of a tall, dark young man who leaned against the wall watching the dancers, for if there existed an evil fate for them, this man was it, and his name was Clifford Revel.
