LES DERNIERES PENSEES

(From Paul Fort's Poémes de France, a sheet published fortnightly.) THE twilight falls, Soring's softest airs wave round my head again, What strange thing comes with them to-night? The dreams of dying men. Hark! By the open window there, what means that rustling leaf? A dying soldier's dying thoughts, his love and joy and grief. You bell, whose sounds across the fields die slowly one by one, A dying soldier's ears still hear its solemn-booming tone. Another's last thoughts travel back to scenes of childish play, To boys who roved the fields with him through many a summer day So near their dreams are. This sweet hour is drenched with memory ricall we ask We would not stay our sons who fight and die My dying boy, whose dying eyes pass from some darkened room where in the old farmstead still lambs bleat and fruit trees bloom You will not be the last, my boy. Others like you will come. from their death-heds, to console some sorrow-stricken home That clock upon the chamber-wall, - its dull voice seems to moan reaming of him it knew from birth now dying in Argonne, Ves dreams are o'er us all Agress this sweet French air to night The dving watch us in their dreams, more seeing than our sight. A sailor drowns: what meets his ear from far across the lands? Some pleasant sound of dinner things set by his mother's hand. Ah, swallows, as ye come, ye go! Life's dream is ending now For oh how many! Is't to heaven that their dear last dreams go?
