An Oriental died, leaving seventeen camels. He willed one-half to his eldest son, one-third to the second and one-ninth to the third son. While disputing about the division a camel driver came along and offered to settle the question. This he did by loaning them one of his own camels, thus making eighteen in all, when the division was easy. No. 1 took nine camels, No. 2 six camels, No. 3 two camels—seventeen in all—and the borrowed camel was then restored to its owner. How can we explain the fact that each son got his share and something over?

A Story of Beecher.

Henry Ward Beecher had a very strong dislike to all financial and business matters. Frederic L. Colver, the publisher, relates a good story of Beecher's peculiarity in these matters. It was in the fall of 1886. Colver was publishing the Brooklyn Magazine, and the method of newspapers in syndicating special articles was in high favor. Colver, who had known Beecher for many years, was urging him strongly to write a series of weekly articles on current events and had offered the preacher $100 for each article of a newspaper column in length.

Beecher heard all the young man's reasons patiently and then with characteristic humor said: "Now, my son, you cannot make such articles go. I think the newspapers consider me. Henry Ward Beecher had a very you cannot make such articles go. I think the newspapers consider me a squeezed lemon aiready. I shouldn't want to see you fail on my account, and, besides, you know I hate to be tied down to regular work."

Mrs. Beecher, who was sitting in a corner of the famous Beecher study in the Brooklyn home, said: "Henry, why don't you let the young man try his plan? He has studied it all out."

To this Beecher replied: "Well, mother, you can settle the matter, but he must do the business with you. I don't care to be bound to write something every week, and I don't like to take the boy's money."

And so it was settled in favor of the persistent Colver, and thereafter Mrs. Beecher was the go-between and obtained the copy each week, and the checks were paid to her, whether for "pin money" or not Calver never know.
