given such an ugly end to his love- lookout on the green umbrella.

Bethel sank sobbing on a couch, assuring herself and her friends that it was indeed an ugly fellow, the like of whom she had never seen before, of huge stature, and with white hair; for so it looked to her in the moonlight. Then, when the gentlemen came in, she would take some wine and retire, as she felt upset and ill. Brinley's pallid, blood-stained looks invoked her compassion as he, with great tenderness, bent over her couch administering wine; then, seeing her look brighter, he took her hand, and pressing his lips to it, said boldly: Friends, this night's encounter was

Meanwhile, Bethel's pretty possession of gaily-painted boats swept along the bend of the sun-lit river, and arrived at the ruined castle. There was a pleasant sound of popping corks, and a clattering of plates, mingling with cheery laugh and jest.

Thus, while the merry groups were enjoying their picnic, the poor tramp, famine-stricken and weak, dragged his weary limbs along the sunny side of the river, feeling only the heat and his weakness and misery, noticing nothing in the sweet still life about him to call forth admiration.

A bird, soaring over the calm expanse of pleasant water, sang melodiously; a grasshopper chirped, a frog croaked, a shy big-hearted rabbit ran across his path, and a large butterfly wasted a moment in front of him, wafted by his labored breath. Still he plodded on in dumb indifferent fashion, till he came to a tiny cottage by the waterside, a cottage with a neat little garden, and one fat pig, who grunted at the wayfarer; there were perky hens, and important cocks.
