THE POISE

Of a woman in perfect health attracts the eye at once. Such a woman is all too rarely seen. The most of women bear scars of suffering on their faces which no smiles can hide, and often in their very carriage betray the womanly weakness which oppresses them. There can be no perfect health for the woman who suffers from disease of the delicate womanly organism. Her general health is so intimately related to the local health of the womanly organs that these must be cured before the general

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well. It cures womanly disorders and diseases; brightens the dull eye, rounds out the hollow cheek and gives strength for wifely duties and maternal cares.

But the next words of his companion enlightened him upon the subject.

"Well, it isn't wonderful that he didn't care to give you a history of the scape-grace of the family. He and I never hitched very well, either, for he was one of your goody-goody sort—the gentleman, in fact, of the house of Remington, while I was just the reverse. It wasn't in me to be good; the devil seemed to be born in me; I suppose I inherited it from my mother, who was a kind of a Tartar, and I just had to let the devil have his way; a pretty dance he has led me, too,

His name was Maxwell Dexter Remington, and when I was born my father, who was a poor man, named me after him, hoping he'd give me a slice of his wealth. The other family, who, by the way, were not on the best of terms with ours—my mother was jealous and overbearing, and it was hard getting along with her—had a son, too, about the same time, and followed my parents' example in naming him, doubtless with a similar hope. Well, the other Maxwell was a golden-haired, blue-eyed cherub, and the black-eyed, swarthy-hued Max, which was myself, was a young devil, as I have previously intimated.

"Of course, the character has been our home ever since."

"He died, as I told you last night, when I was an infant only a few months old." Max said, in reply. "He had brain fever which resulted in a prolonged mental trouble. At that time he was living in Pennsylvania; but, a few years later, my mother removed to Chicago, which has been our home ever since."

"Let me see—I believe I heard that he married a very handsome woman," said Mr. Remington, musingly.

"Yes, my mother is a very beautiful woman," Max replied, with an earnestness which betrayed his own unbounded admitted their. I lost sight of him after our uncle died and he came into possession of his money-bags. We were not remarkably congenial, you know, especially after that"—with a significant wink—"so our paths naturally diverged."

of his rich bachelor uncle. He was bright and keen, loved study, and was always at the head of his class. He went to church every week, also to Sunday shool, and said his catechism like a nice shool, and said his catechism like a lifety little man. He never swore nor told lies; as he grew up he neither smoked nor chewed the filthy weed, nor 'looked upon the wine when it was red,' while dice and cards, in his estimation, were among the unpardonable sins. He went to college and graduated with honor, and was of course the nattern par excelwas, of course, the pattern, par excel-lence, of a fine young gentleman. "The reverse was the character of the other Max, and—well, to make a long short, there was nothing evil that he wasn't steeped in, and instead of graduating creditably, he was expelled from college six months after entering, and, from that time, had to shift for himself, though this rich grand-uncle had given both boys the same chance, and hinted that, if they did well, they should share alike in his will. His mind seemed to have been entirely diverted from his illners by this meeting with Max, and the revival of leng dormant memories, and they appeared to produce the very effect which his medi-ine was intended to achieve; or, perhaps, It was both combined, for tired nature seemed suddenly to assert its claims in the middle of his rambling, and he drop-ped off to sleep, like a tired child in the midst of a song.

Max had plenty of food for meditation to keep him awake after that, weary though he was, as he sat in that quiet though he was, as he sat in that ouiet room, wondering at the strange fate that had thrown him across the nath of this relative—this scape-goat of the Remington family, as he called himself.

Now he could understand much that had seemed inexplicable before: he could now comprehend how Laura had managed to claim the fortune which she had aged to claim the fortune which she had

Strange, he thought, that he should never have suspected that there might never have suspected that there might be two men bearing the same name: stranger still, that his mother should never have told him of the fact. But, possibly, it was as this man had intimated—that the cultivated, proud, and sensitive gentleman, who had abrunk from his wild and dissipated cousin durates his early life had also shrunk from ing his early life, had also shrunk from friends bore the same name to which he answered.

Yes, it was true that there had been two Maxwell D. Remingtons of about the same age; one the noble Christian gentleman, who had married Adele Fontain and loved and honored her as long as he lived; the other a scheming, dissolute vagabond, who had lured Anna Pomeroy into a secret marriage, hoping thus to gain an entrance into a wealthy family, but who, upon discovering his error, had heartlessly deserted her. "Now my mother can be set right," was almost the first thought that came to Max when he realized all this. "When this story is known, no stain can rest upon either her or her loved husband's memory. She need no longer shrink from the society where, for years, she has shone a brilliant and honored woman, and where she would again be warmly welcomed by the many friends who have been so faithful to her in her time of trouble.

"And Laura—for of course this man must be her father," he continued, "could she have known the story of these two lives? Yes, she must have known it, and how cunningly she has used this knowledge to secure to herself the wealth that her father had forteited by his that her father had forfeited by his reckless career! How artful she has been from beginning to end! How cleverly she has carried her plot to completion! at now, of course, since the truth is nown, she will be compelled to restore known, she will be compelled to restore the stolen possessions." Max realized, however, that he would

Max realized, however, that he would have to work quickly to secure this result, for he had learned, when he was last in Chicago, that she intended to sail for Europe within a few weeks.

His resolve was speedily taken.

He would take this wreck, this "scape-grace of the Remingtons," home with him, build him up a little, until he should get control of his nerves, then he would bring him face to face with Laura, prove their relationship, and thus secure his mother's complete vindication and the restoration of her property.

restoration of her property.

Max's patient slept quietly for two hours, and then he began to move restlessly and to mutter incoherently.

The young man quietly administered his drops, and then noiselessly returned to his seat by the fire, hoping that he would drop asleep again.

The man lay drowsily watching him for a while, occasionally muttering something about the "blue-eyed cherub" and the "old bachelor's favorite"; but he finally grew quiet and sank into a restful slumber once more. He did not wake until daylight, when the clerk came to relieve Max, who at once repaired to his room, where, throwing himself, without undressing, upon his bed, he slept until eight o'clock.

After he had had his breakfast he went to the office to inquire how the invalid was, and the clerk informed him that, to the surprise of everyone, he seemed very comfortable.

Max then told him that he had discovered a hitherto unknown relative in the stranger, also that he would assume his hotel expenses and the care of him, a bit of news that seemed to greatly re-woman, Max replied, with an earnest-ness which betrayed his own unbounded admiration and affection for her. Then, anxious to learn more regarding his com-panion's personal history, he continued: "But how about yourself, sir—were you never married?"

The man colored hotly, as if the question had aroused exceedingly disagreeable memories, and his black eyes had a fierce, vindictive glare in them as he responded with emphatic pre "Married? Yes." profanity:

"Married? Yes."
As if to assuage the unpleasant sensations he experienced he hastily lifted the glass that contained his dram, and drained it at single draught. Then, leaning Max, he assumed a confidential air and remarked:

"You've treated me like a gentleman, young man, and, even though you are the son of my rival of whom I was bit-terly envious in my youth, I don't mind telling you something of my life. Yes, I married, as you would naturally expect a man of my caliber to marry," he said. a man of my canteer to marry, he said, with a bitter sneer. "I hunted around urtil I thought I'd found a girl with plenty of money—for I'd no notion of working hard to support either myself of a family. The girl's folks were rather opposed to me, as a son-in-law so I invited her one fine day to take a ride with me, and—I never brought her back. I had a marriage license in my pocket, and we were made man and wife before sundown. A little later we sailed for Europe, where I had to go on business for the firm in whose employ I was. But that was a bad day's work for me, for the girl hadn't a red cent of her own, nor wasn't likely to have; she was only the step-daughter of the man whom she called father, though she was called by his name, and he had a son who would inherit all his money. I could have stood it with a bitter grace," the man went on, with a vindictive scowl, "though money was the main thing that had tempted was the main thing that had tempted me, if the girl hadn't been such a Tartar, for I was really rather fond of her. But she had a tongue like a nest of nettles, and she knew how to use it, too in a way to drive a fellow wild. Well, I stood it for a while, but one day, when she it for a while, but one day, when she got worse than usual, I walked off—took "You deserted her?" Max said, involun-

He was so indignant and disgusted with the man's flippant, heartless style of relating his treatment of his wife, that he found it difficult to control himself, and this plain statement of the fact came out almost before he was aware of it.

The elder Remington flushed, with a sudden sense of shame, beneath the words. He had conceived a great liking for this handsome young fellow who bore his name and conducted himself in such a manly, straightforward way, and, for the first time in his life, perhaps, he realized how his treatment of his wife appeared to the eyes of honorable men.

BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS.

THE GREATEST OF SPRING MEDICINES.

In the spring the system is so overloaded with impurities that the organs are unable to properly eliminate the waste matter.

is of the the greatest value in cleansing internally, just as soap and water cleanses externally. It flushes the sewers of the body, awakens the torpid organs and renews activity, fure blood is pumped to all parts of the body, thereby cleansing, purify and strengthening it. Don't stay sick, weak, tired and listless this spring. Take Burdock Blood Bitters and feel bright, healthy and vigorous. It turns Bad Blood into Rich Red Blood.

Fandom was shaken with emotion vesterday by the news, sent broadcast over America from New York, that Christopher Matthewson's salary arm has gone lame again and that as a result the mighty collegian will be un-tention to Matthewson's extraordinary record as a ball-player. Though but 21 years, he is without a doubt the greatest and the most scientific ball pitcher in the world today. As one admiring biographer puts it in the New York Telegraph: "He can put a Batteries—Lee and Drill; McGinnity and curve on a ball that will curl feathers,
