

father's authority as to the religious faith in which his children shall be educated, are also described at considerable length.

Leading cases on probate and succession duty have been inserted, though necessarily in a condensed form.

A new feature of probate practice introduced in this treatise is the re-sealing of grants in accordance with the provision of the Colonial Probate Act 1892, (Imp.), entitled, "An Act to provide for the recognition in the United Kingdom of probates and letters of administration granted in British Possessions"; and of the Act entitled, "An Act respecting ancillary probates and letters of administration."

The book is sure to be of great service to all persons having business in the courts referred to, or in connection with the estates of deceased persons.

To the Editor of THE CANADA LAW JOURNAL :

SIR,—I heard a rumour some short time ago that there was a possibility of the "Notes on Current English Cases" published in your valuable periodical being discontinued. I am much pleased to notice that this idea, if it ever was seriously contemplated, has not been carried into effect. While it is quite true that the library of a practising barrister can hardly be said to be complete without the English as well as our own law reports, the professional man who carefully reads these notes is furnished with the gist of the current law of the kingdom, and has a synopsis of English cases that must prove of real value. The notes are also of much assistance to the busy professional man, and, as time-savers alone, are worth more than the subscription price of your journal. They show in themselves much ability and care, and are evidently the work of a trained legal mind. I desire that you should know that in many quarters this unique feature of THE CANADA LAW JOURNAL is appreciated, so that you may feel yourself justified in still giving it a prominent place in your journal. The value of legal articles depends on the standing of the writers; these notes are boiled down case law of the best kind.

BARRISTER.

Barrie, Sept. 9th.
