

obtaining white domestic labour for our new settlers and fruit growers.

We can, I think, trust him to protect our fishing grounds and keep British Columbia's most important industry for those who may sooner or later be called upon to protect them for us, and he, in turn, may rely upon the support of a united people already strongly attached to him.

Domestic labour is not congenial to the white people of the West; deep sea fishing is.